We can live without pleasure; but not joy

How good it is to laugh and feel the release that laughter brings. It is all too easy to get caught up in taking ourselves and all the heavy issues that impinge on our life so seriously that we lose the capacity for humor.

Laughter springs from one of two wellsprings in our lives: pleasure and joy, wellsprings which are quite distinct.

Pleasure comes from without; from all that we find in our world that appeals, that gives content to that illusive experience that we call happiness. Think of all the places you'd like to be, people you want to be with, activities that touch our sense of pleasure.

How do you play? When and where does the child in you get loose and "play ball" or "get hugged" or wander in the secret garden of your imaginations? We all like feeling good and spend a good deal of time figuring out with whom and at which point we can move into our environment in such a way that has the best chance of producing pleasure. We seek a career that seeks pleasure. We look for relationships that do the same. Some of us even determine that a certain lifestyle or position in life will bring pleasure and therefore we work to those ends.

There's another wellspring of laughter that holds more promise, I believe, it is joy. Joy comes from within, rather than from without. Joy is the happiness of love, a deep inner feeling that can fill our being even in the midst of personal suffering; yes! even when we are in pain. Joy emerges as we live in congruence with our deepest internal values. For me, that means living lovingly, or to put it in other terms, to live under the heart of God.

Joy, then, has little to do with our external world measured in terms of lifestyle or affluence or success. It has everything to do with discovering our deepest selves with all our yearnings and strivings, hopes and dreams, fears and frustrations and being true to that self. If we are true to our God-gifted self, we will know joy even if the outward course of events brings suffering, opposition, or injustice to our lives.

Even if the world seems to conspire to deny us pleasure, we still can live with much joy. I've known many who lacked joy and seek frantically to fill that void with the pursuit of pleasure. Much of pursuing and much of sexual activity seems to have that kind of franticness that speaks clearly of the lack of joy. Those others who have discovered the kind of loving that balances the needs of self with the needs of others also discover a wellspring of joy that, no matter what the external circumstances, allows smiles, a sense of delight, a freedom to appreciate the smallest gifts and insights. Would that we all could move beyond our search for pleasure into the deeper, more sustaining experience of joy.

"Take back the night" is a rally cry for everyone

On March 16, an event is scheduled that could impact everybody on this campus. The event? A march entitled "Take back the night."

Like most events that bring awareness of a problem to the public it is unfortunate that this march has to be scheduled.

"Take back the night" is a rally cry for people to let men who rape, abuse, rob women know their behavior is not acceptable. The main point of the march is the women are tired of being scared to walk alone at night.

Why should anyone be concerned about her safety when she walks home from the library, or walks to her car, or has to use a payphone in an abandoned area?

Yes, some of you out there will say that this is the 90s and that's the way it is. That argument is astinine. How far back do you want to go with the status quo? To when women couldn't vote? To when slavery was accepted? To when a revolver settled arguments? To when there was no indoor plumbing?

The rumors about this issue shouldn't be about who is being excluded (no one is), the rumors should be about who isn't involved. It would be nice if not being involved in the march was considered a social faux pas.

"Did you hear about Jim? He watched a basketball game instead of marching in support of a woman's right to walk outside at night."

That should be an example of the rumors and stories around campus instead of a lie about men being not allowed to march.

Diane Edwards, advisor to the Student Team Against Rape (STAR), said last week no men have approached her about joining the group or expressed interest in marching.

The STAR team is not a group of men-bashers who will, on March 16, scream obscenities about men and what some have done. That would defeat the purpose of the event. The march is designed to draw attention to the problems of rape, abuse, and assault; not to call men names.

At other campuses there are men groups who deal with the issue of rape. One group at the University of Virginia, the Southern Star, is a group of men who approach an alleged rapist and, using nonviolent methods, let him know his behavior is wrong and will not be tolerated.

The Southern Star is secret and can only be contacted after a classified ad has been placed by a woman who has been raped or assaulted in the Cavalier Daily, UVA's student newspaper, wanting the group to take action.

This is a people issue, not a woman's or man's issue. The sooner everyone realizes it the better.

Mens B-Ball page?

On this page you will find an editorial stating The Seahawk is biased in its sports coverage. Fair enough, most of the stories on the sports page in recent weeks have been geared to the men's basketball team.

In defense of Wayne Williams, the sports editor, he is usually the only member of the sports department. That is not an excuse, that is a fact.

The writer states there are many events happening Saturday and says there should be equal coverage for all. The Seahawk agrees wholeheartedly. But the problem is most of the events occur at the same time. In order to accurately cover each event, it is best to be at the event.

If people want to see better coverage of the sports and events on this campus, some will have to get involved with the paper. The writer of the editorial asked if he could preview the CAA swim meet. Her article appears on page 10.

Paula McNeill

Seahawk sports coverage needs to improve

I have heard several comments and ideas about the sports page that I would like to share with you.

Many of the readers think the sports page is biased and unfair. True, the basketball team is the school's money-bringer, they are having a good year and deserve the publicity, but on the other hand, what about the other sports teams.

For example, volleyball had a pretty good season and the swim team went undefeated until last week when they swam against N.C. State.

The cross country team, from what I hear, is pretty good, but I would not know because there is never anything in the paper about it. What about softball, tennis, track, golf, and any other sport I may have overlooked?

Everyone always talks about how our school has no spirit. I feel that this could be achieved and that we could make our school better by being supportive of all school sports and athletes. This should start with the media and publication (as I have learned in communication classes). If the paper started giving support to the other athletic teams, maybe the students would.

For example, many activities are going on February 20. I think that as many of these events that can be covered should be. I know basketball games are going on, but there is also a softball tournament, a SK run, a lacrosse match and many more.

I know for a fact that swimming and diving have a conference meet that weekend that includes not only UNCW, but also other colleges as well, such as JMU, American, William and Mary, and Richmond, just to name a few.

I also realize that senior athletes of many sports do not get recognized except at the sports banquet. I feel the paper should contain in the article a section for senior athletes. This is very important as many of them have worked four long years, working hard, obtaining discipline and drive in order to make it through the season.

I feel The Seahawk, as well as student support, should be improved by equal coverage (not just a paragraph) of other sports. The sports that are done for the year should at least have an article summarizing their season and acknowledging their seniors.

This idea must be started with you. With the start of coverage by you, maybe students would learn more about the sport and actually go out and support the team. We need more team spirit at this school.

It could start with you-how about giving it a chance?

Phil Smith

Phil won't touch "musical condom"

From AP Reports

Fargone, North Dakota—In a story more bizarre than anything Phil Smith could ever dream up, Leo Wilking found a surprise laying (or is it lying?) on his couch at 3:00 a.m. the other morning. It seems that Mr. Wilking was having trouble sleeping and came downstairs to watch television when he spotted the blanketed intruder on his couch. After deciding it wasn't his wife (if he had to see his wife if it took him a second look to decide) he called the local police (not to be confused with our own beloved Campus Police Force), who arrived with the speed of Australian three-toed sloths (again not to be confused with UNCW Campus Police officers).

The Sloths/officers woke the man, who was more than a little teed-off at being awakened at three in the morning. The man, somewhat intoxicated, claimed that he thought he was in his own house which was more than a mile away. A friend had dropped him off after a night of drinking, and he just walked in and fell asleep on the couch. He was charged with misdemeanor trespass and possession of a "small amount" of marijuana. Things that make you go NAH!!!!

I would say that there are two morals to the preceding story. Moral #1: If you are going to be found on a stranger's couch at three in the morning, don't have a "small amount" of marijuana in your shirt pocket. Moral #2: Beware of this column during slow news weeks and/or weeks when Phil has five or more exams. Such columns are likely to begin with really cheesy items stolen from the Wilmington Morning Star.

In national news, President Clinton has finally found a candidate for Attorney General who has never hired an illegal alien nor torn off the "DO NOT REMOVE" tags from any of her furniture. She did admit to once axe-murdering a family in Oregon, but officials say that should have no bearing on her confirmation.

Speaking of axe-murdering, did any of you see My Bloody Valentine on TV last week? It was the typical low budget, psycho gets out of mental hospital, puts on a noisy face mask and terrorizes a small town that is full of people too stupid to notice an axe-murder on the loose. I only watched long enough to see a lady get tossed in a dryer set on ultra-high, but I counted nearly fifty violations of my Five Tips For Living Through A Cheap Horror Flick (previous issue).

Moving on to something lighter, I saw something on the Jay Leno show the other night that was funnier than the lady in the dryer. Leno announced the production of a fully functional "musical condom." You'd have to let your imagination roll with this one because, considering the journalistic standards I perspire to, I'm not going to touch it.

Turning to local news, The Seahawk will not be published next week and so this is my only chance to announce... MY BIRTHDAY. Yes friends, on February 28, 1993 I will be 21 years old. My true birthday was February 29, 1972, but since those brain-dead Romans didn't know how to make a decent calendar, that day only comes around every four years. You'd think the leaders of what was one of the largest empires on Earth could have come up with a functional calendar.

Of course, I can't blame it all on the ancient Romans. The more likely culprit is, of course, my mother. If only she could have held on a few more hours (you know, like when you are around people and need to break wind; you hold off). Mom still has trouble "holding it in" sometimes, but that doesn't make it any easier for me to explain my birthday to folks who don't understand the Leap Year concept. By the way it's not too late for you rush out and purchase birthday gifts. My friends at the UNCW Post Office have assured me that if you go ahead and get them in the mail soon, I'll be sure to get them before Spring Break.

The Hat's Off award this week is shared between my mom and dad. It goes to my mom for not disowning me after reading this and to my dad because it's not good to give one parent a Hat's Off award without recognizing the other. Besides, I think they've done good to put up with this "little fat" for nearly 21 years. Hat's Off to the folks!

Shoes Off this week goes to me, NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith, because the beginning of this week's column really stinks. Besides, I need to show everyone that I'm not above self criticism. I'll take Shoes Off this week.

Well, I guess that about wraps it up for this week. Look for the next issue sometime in March, when/it I make it back from Spring Break. Have a safe and enjoyable vacation. If you come across any NoBull Prize winning column material, save it and send it to me at The Seahawk.

Until next time...keep you mind out of the gutter, and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is a NoBull Prize winning columnist with The Seahawk, and there are just ten shopping days until his birthday.

Coach Kevin Eastman Speaks

To all UNCW Basketball Fans:

Just a short note of thanks for all of your great support so far this season. You have been so large in number and so loud in voice that we are making every opponent fear us when they come to Trask Coliseum. Duke and the Cameron Crazies better be careful, because with three more selfless student body games left we will emerge as (having) one of the best home court advantages in this region and the country. You are all a major part of our home court success this year. Please make sure to get there early for our last three home games.

I would also like to ask you to please refrain from throwing anything on the floor at all! This would include the little basketballs that are given away at halftime. The NCAA has instituted a new rule this year whereby it is an automatic technical foul WITHOUT A WARNING! If anything comes onto the floor. Please don't give our opponent any type of advantage. Let's make them earn every single thing they get.

Again, thanks because you're the best!

SENEC Receives Grant

The Southeastern Network for Economic Development (SENEC) has received a $100,000 grant from the Z. Smith Reynolds Foundation. Effective January 1, the funding will be used as part of the program's operating budget for 1993-94.

The network, created by UNCW's Division for Public Service and Extended Education at the instruction of Chancellor James R. Leutze, is working to improve and contribute to the economic development of the 16 counties that make up the region in which the university is situated.

Some of the work done by SENEK in 1992 included: identifying the role of the university in regional economic development; forming preliminary goals in the areas of economic growth, education, environment, leadership, cultural resources, technology and infrastructure; developing a business resource directory of small business assistance centers, economic development specialists, area chambers of commerce, county planning agencies, and other state and local resources; and studying the possibilities of a major aquaculture facility in Wilmington.

In 1993, SENEK plans to concentrate on problem solving and specific economic development efforts. One of these efforts is enhancing and expanding the telecommunications infrastructure within the region.

SENEK also plans to serve the regional governing bodies by acting as a mediator, moderator, and facilitator between the university and other agencies.

New Faculty Association

The Asian-American members of the UNCW faculty, who constitute about 4.5% of the total faculty, recently formed the Asian-American Faculty Association (AAFA). The AAFA, formed for professional and cultural reasons, seeks to promote greater understanding among different cultures as UNCW becomes increasingly diversified. The association plans to sponsor social and cultural events in the community and to make its members available as guest lecturers to local schools, social groups, and organizations.

Mullendore Receives Award

Dr. Richard H. Mullendore, associate vice chancellor for student affairs at UNCW, has been named the 1992 recipient of the Outstanding Professional Contribution Award from the North Carolina College Personnel Association. The criteria for the award included implementation of creative programs, teaching, and making a lasting contribution to the profession through presentations, publications, and participation in professional organizations.

Russian, UNCW Scientist Collaborates

A collaboration between a Russian scientist and a UNCW professor to study marine algae that absorb heavy metal may one day help clean pollution in the Black sea and other troubled Eastern European waters.

Dr. Konstantine Burdin, who is in charge of studying pollution in the Black Sea and Baltic regions of Russia for the Moscow State University, is in the beginning of a nine-month research project in collaboration with the Center for Marine Science Research at UNCW.

At UNCW, Burdin is working with Dr. Kimon Bird, associate professor of biology and marine biotechnology program coordinator at the Center for Marine Science Research.

Together, they are examining heavy metal pollution of the ocean water, studying marine algae that absorb heavy metals, and working to find ways to use those algae to clean polluted marine environments.

Hill to Read and Sign his new book

Office of Recreation and Intramural Programs

Heart and Sole Fitness

Keeping a Balance

Traditionally, becoming fit meant running, walking, swimming or anything aerobic. The woman or man who enjoys these activities has achieved a very important component of health and fitness - aerobic endurance.

Though aerobic endurance is essential, there are other components of fitness that are nearly as important. Flexibility, body composition and muscle strength and endurance are the other key components of a balanced fitness program. Whether you're an elite athlete or a recreational jogger, a balanced fitness program should be a part of every person's life style. The five components of balanced fitness are:

Cardiorespiratory endurance (aerobic)

Activities: running, aerobic classes, jump roping, swimming. Include aerobic activities in your program for at least 20 minutes 3 times a week.

Flexibility

Activities: Yoga, stretching, any activities which gently stretch the muscles through a full range of motion. A 5-10 minute warm up will prepare the body for the workout ahead.

Body Composition

Percentage of body fat as opposed to lean body tissue.

Muscle Strength

Activities: Free weights, weight machines, rubber bands, calisthenics. Add strength training to your program 2-3 times a week.

Muscle Endurance

Activities: Increased repetitions of the exercise on free weights, weight machines, rubber bands, and calisthenics that build muscle strength but with lighter weights or resistance.

A balanced fitness program can be achieved through cross training across a training program including a variety of activities that will enhance your overall fitness. Extra effort may be required but the benefits are well worth it. It is a pretty simple idea that can add a lot of fun to your exercise experience.

This coming weekend, the Men's Ultimate team will be traveling to the UVA campus in Charlottesville, VA for a college tournament. This is the first event for a young Seamen team in a rebuilding year.

The newly formed UNCW Lacrosse Club will be competing against Cape Fear in a league game here at UNCW. The game will begin on Saturday at 12:00 at the Gazebo field.

The UNCW Sailing Club will be hosting the South points #1 sailing event which is sponsored by the SAISA. The race will be held at Wrightsville Beach at Banks Channel and will begin at 9:00 a.m.

The Rugby Club will be playing against Duke on Saturday at 1:00 p.m. on Brooks field. Come out and support the many active Club sports teams as they represent UNC-Wilmington.

"Making Time for Leisure... Re-Creating through Recreation"

Out of bed at six, in class by eight, catch a bite at twelve, back in class until three, early dinner at four, work until ten, studying until you can't hold your eyes open. What a schedule, and one that probably sounds pretty familiar to most students and faculty/staff in our UNCW community. Needless to say living this routine on a day to day basis leads to burnout and an unbalanced existence. How can we regain control? Making time to play could prove to be a good start.

The big question at this point may be: Where in my already busy schedule do I make leisure time? Making time for leisure requires us to utilize our time efficiently. If we examine our schedules and the tasks that make up our day we may find ways to save five minutes here and there. The result could be ten, fifteen, or even twenty minutes of yes, believe it or not, free time. Converting this time into leisure time and participating in some type of recreational activity could do wonders. Spending only ten minutes reading a book for fun, walking with no real destination, sitting on the beach, or shooting a basketball can facilitate a clear head and energize us for the rest of the day. Another outcome of productive leisure time may be more time for leisure. The energy that recreating can give us can make us more productive and facilitating more efficient use of time. That initial ten minutes a day you play can slowly become fifteen then twenty, and you still will be accomplishing the same number of tasks a day.

The hardest part about recreating is making the time to get started. Remember that leisure time does not have to be of great lengths and recreational activities can be simple. The results of ten minutes of play can be seen and felt throughout our busy days.

Before I finally put in print the timely letter from Chris Powell, which has been in and out of my possession for two weeks now, I would like to be pseudo-serious for a brief moment.

On Sunday the Lady Seahawks were at home to another sell out crowd, playing James Madison. I made it to the game with the Seahawks trailing, 30-to-8.

I thought to myself, geez this could get ugly. Basically I was right. BUT the Seahawks showed me a glimpse of what is to come for this young team, and I tell you I like what I saw.

I cringed once when the Seahawks were beaten down court on the break and then again back on defense. I was thinking gee-oh-ay, someone stop this thing, BUT THEN, it happened the scrappy young Seahawk team seemed to hustle a little harder, play a little more aggressive. For example UNCW applied a monster trap on a JMU player, that was the funniest thing I have ever seen. I started with two Seahawk players aggressively trapping a scared trembling JMU player on the right wing, before she picked up her dribble to make a good pass within seconds she was surrounded by four ball yelling, jumping, bumping down by twenty Seahawk players.

If you are thinking that there were four other JMU players some where open, well it seems that they were intimidated by this heuristic aggressive defensive posture and fled down court. With no one to pass the ball to JMU turned the ball over.

This in my opinion has to be the Seahawk play of the year. This young team will develop in the coming years as long as they continue to work together, play hard. Keep hustling, and keep working hard anything can happen during the tournament.

The Chris Powell Letter

Monday, February 1 was one of the longest days for me. I can't count the number of times I heard some remark about how the Cowboys dominated those losers from the AFC. It is very painful for me to say the following things to Cowboy Fans.

First, I would like to say that I got very emotional when my fellow Redskins lovers say that they support my views of the Cowboys this past season. However, I was very wrong about the Cowgirls, oh pardon me, the Super-Bowl Champion Cowboys. Dallas proved me wrong and now it is time for words I will never forgive myself for saying.

To Kevin, Lance, Reggie, Leon, Vern, James and other Cowboys, I am ... No! I can't say it! It's painful to admit that the Dallas Cowboys are the best team in the National Football League, but I am a man of my word.

The Dallas Cowboys proved that they are the best team in the NFL. They were explosive on offense and Bullish on Defense. Jimmy Johnson proved that youth and speed can go all the way. I can't say enough of how talented and energetic this team is.

This is the only time you will hear anything good about Dallas coming from me. For the record, the Cowboys are America's Team, but the Redskins are America's Heroes.

DISCLAIMER

The views of Chris Powell, Marge Schott and Jimmy The Greek are not necessarily the views of the Seahawk or any of its staff members. The Seahawk deserves the right to decline future such publications of Dallas praise. Sorry Mr. Bowwing.

CAA Championship Coming

BY PAULA MCNEILL
Sports Writer

There is something big going on Wednesday through Saturday at the UNCW's Seahawk Natatorium. There will be excitement and cheers as UNCW enters the CAA Swim Meet. For those of you do not know what CAA stands for its Colonial Athletic Association. This year will mark the 8th annual Swimming and Diving Championships. The conference is very challenging as the coaches have done a fine job training talented swimmers and divers. Coach Allen finds the atmosphere exciting and competitive as well as a good opportunity for all the universities to compete.

The UNCW swim team have had a great season with the men's team record being 8-1, a Seahawk best, their only loss coming at the hands of N.C. State. The women's team comes in with a record of 5-4. Both teams have accomplished a great deal with unique individuals brought together by commitment and a desire to achieve the same goals. They believe in themselves and what they are doing. The seniors, Mark Alford, Chris Daniels, Ben Nigro, Chris White and Amy Lewis have had a big responsibility by providing leadership. They are a link to the teams of the past and they are able to familiarize the new swimmers with the program. All the swimmers seem to have positive attitude in regards to the upcoming CAA meet.

Coach Allen thinks UNCW has a good chance of capturing the CAA Championship. Allen thinks the teams have improved, and challenges the swimmers by telling them the most important thing is to perform well, swim fast to improve their times, and then let the points fall where they may just as long as they are getting something for their efforts.

Last Season the Seahawk Baseball team finished the season at 23-35 and finished sixth in the Colonial Athletic Association.

This season with six starters not the Seahawks have returned back to action in pre-season games last Saturday against Davidson winning 3-0.

This season, second-year Coach, Mark Scalf (a graduate of UNCW'80), has seven starters in which to build this year's team including any number of seventeen returning lettermen.

Of those returning, senior Cory Broome averaged .290 batting average, amassing 36 runs batted in and 13 stolen bases, and Sr. Kevin Hooker, who averaged .248 batting and 28 of 36 stolen bases, will be heading their offensive attack.

"The strength of the team will come from our solid defense, we are as good or better than last years team, which was just .01 of a percentage away from breaking a school record," said Coach Scalf. "We have a close knit group, which is willing to work every day in order to improve. We are working on pitchers in getting ahead in the count, in the short pre-season. We work on live situations, encompassing fielding, throwing, and swinging the bat and batting situations."

UNCW Crew starting season

BY BRYAN GIBSON
Crew Correspondent

The UNCW Crew is preparing for a busy spring season this spring. The team hopes to represent UNCW in America's oldest intercollegiate sport, in three or more major regattas.

They wish to compete in the Duke-Lake Michie Invitational on April 3, the George Mason Invitational Regatta on April 4, and the Clemson Springs Regatta, April 10.

The Club which is composed of thirty-five members is doing quite a bit of training on land which includes working with weights, circuit training, running and using the concept II rowing machines. They plan to be hitting the water in addition to these exercises within the next two weeks.

The UNCW Crew team is Co-ed, with women being two thirds of their weeks.

The UNCW Crew team is Co-ed, with women being two thirds of their membership. They compete in two types of events. The 8 person hull novice (first year) and varsity (best team which may include novices), and also they compete in 4 person varsity and novice events.

The best team for UNCW is their, lightweight (boat's weight) varsity four man. This boat's efforts prove that Crew is the ultimate team sport, every one has to be ready and present in order to have a chance in competition.

The regattas that UNCW attend have men's and women's events that are similar to a track meet. This semester (March 13) the crew team will sponsor the Second Annual Alligator Sprint-In Indoor Rowing Invitational in Hanover Hall.

On March 24th and 25th, the Crew team will conduct its second annual "UNCW Crew Ergothon" on the lawn of the University Center. In this the team will row on a rowing machine (ergometer) for twenty four hours, from 12 noon on Wednesday to 12 noon on Thursday.

Board of Trustees Opposes Randall Parkway Extension

BY AMY BRENNAN
Staff Writer

The UNCW Board of Trustees stands its ground against proposals to extend Randall Parkway through campus property.

On Jan. 13, the North Carolina Department of Transportation initiated a presentation to the Trustees which re-proposed extending Randall parkway along the North side of campus. The proposed extension would bring traffic down Randall Drive, past the water-tower through the wooded area behind campus, and onto Hooker Road. The purpose of this is to alleviate traffic on College Road by providing an eastern entrance to UNCW.

The proposal is part of a 20 year old transportation plan for the area. Representatives from the State Department of Transportation and the local Transportation Advisory Committee say traffic on College Rd. is going to worsen in the next decade.

According to the Mark Lanier special assistant to the Chancellor, the UNCW Board of Trustees is adamant about opposing the extension for several reasons. The main gas line for the campus runs along Randall Dr. Moving the gas line to allow for road construction would be economically prohibitive.

Cutting through the woods on the east side of campus would severely damage environmentally sensitive areas. Biology professors often make trips into these woods part of their students' learning experience.

Safety is another factor that must be taken into consideration. Many students live in the apartment buildings on Racine Dr. They walk and ride bikes to class. Having to cross a busy road would pose a substantial safety risk.

Noise levels must also be considered. The proposed road would bring a lot of traffic within 80 feet of classroom buildings. This could create an atmosphere conducive to study.

Tom Newman of the State Transportation Dept. says, "The university is the greatest generator of traffic in the greater Wilmington area."

About 30,000 trips are made in and out of campus every day. This accounts for about 20 percent of the traffic on College Rd. Neighborhoods near campus feel the effects of this traffic because many drivers cut through the neighborhoods to avoid College Rd.

Lanier agrees the "something has to be done." "UNCW doesn't want to be part of the problem," he said, "it wants to be part of the solution."

Lanier does not anticipate trouble from the Dept. of Transportation. He believes a solution agreeable to everyone can be reached.

One proposal alternative to a road through campus is to reroute the intersection where Randall Parkway meets the university. The intersection could be changed so that traffic would flow from Randall Pkwy. into College Acres Dr., next to Hardens. From there, traffic would continue to Racine Drive and over to Eastwood Hill. This plan, which is favored by Lanier, is also conducive to the proposed Smith Creek Pkwy.

Another possible alternative is the building of greenways "to facilitate non-vehicular traffic." Chancellor Leutze says there is already the beginning of a greenway near the inland Waterway which comes part Landfall. "Since UNCW property starts more east at Dock Hill on Golf course, why not see if we can hook up what already exists?"

Leutze said the university is looking at what other communities have done in similar situations. "Winston-Salem has a very successful and active greenway. We're going to take a look and find something that will hopefully satisfy everyone."

UNCW students have created an exhibit at the USS North Carolina that portrays Wilmington ship building industry during WWII.

UNCW Students Create Battleship Exhibit

BY AMY PETROCELLI
Staff Writer

Two UNCW graduate students have created a historical exhibit that is now on display at the USS Battleship North Carolina. The exhibit, "The Way to Liberty and Victory: The Story of the North Carolina Shipbuilding Company," was created by Lisa Whitman-Grice and Othello Shirley.

The exhibit is the result of a required practicum for a museum studies course within the Applied History program at UNCW. Course work was completed by the students in December under the directorship of their mentor, Dr. Kristin Szylvian.

The exhibit is "really about the 50th anniversary of World War Two," said Whitman-Grice. It captures the role that this region played in WWII, as well as the significance of the North Carolina Shipbuilding Company, which was instrumental in the construction of vessels during that time.

Using primarily photos and text, the exhibit shows the evolution of the North Carolina Shipbuilding Company. It captures the origins of shipbuilding; its workers, and the launching of ships. The exhibit portrays the effect WWII had on the Wilmington community, by examining the everyday life of the people, with emphasis on issues, entertainment, housing, and transportation of the era. Whitman-Grice stated that it is interesting to see that in this era, for the first time, women were going into the defense industry and the workplace.

"The history of this area," stated Shirley, "was totally impacted by the war effort." Shirley reported that the exhibit's photos were acquired through the New Hanover County Library, the State Port Authority, the Cape Fear Museum, and the North Carolina Underwater archeology unit at Fort Fisher. He stated that the Wilmington Star News was very helpful in the collection of the photos.

Effective Fall 1993 Cancellation of Course Registration

Dr. David K. Miller
Enrollment Manager

A department chairperson, upon recommendation of the instructor, may cancel a student's registration in any course offered in that department if the registered student fails to attend the first class meeting and fails to notify the department office of a desire to remain enrolled within 24 hours of the class time. This cancellation action will only take place when a course is fully enrolled and additional students are waiting to enroll.

The appropriate dean's office should notify the relevant department chairperson of late-arrival students who cannot attend the first class meeting because of illness or other reasons approved by a dean of the college, the professional schools or the dean of students.

If cancellation action is taken by a department chairperson, the registration openings resulting from this action will be offered to students seeking enrollment in the courses during the official drop/add period. Students who have been authorized to add a course should follow the normal drop/add procedures printed in the semester schedule.

Student appeals resulting from emergencies or other extenuating circumstances will be considered on a case-by-case basis in the appropriate dean's office.

Three artifacts are displayed in the exhibit as well. Two of them were borrowed from the Cape Fear museum. They are planks, or markers, that were traditionally put up at the time a ship was being launched. The third artifact, offered by a private citizen, is a broken champagne bottle that is still in its netting and mounted with red, white, and blue ribbons. The broken bottle was salvaged from a ship's christening, which was a formal celebration that preceded its launching.

Whitman-Grice stated that she and Shirley did a great deal of reading and research, and made several contacts in order to write the copy that corresponds with the exhibit.

Whitman-Grice is the Assistant to the Director at the Onslow County Museum, where she began as an intern five years ago. She is a 1988 East Carolina graduate, holding a BS in history with an emphasis in Museum Administration. In January of 1991 she began taking graduate level courses at UNCW and is now working on her thesis. Her career plans, once she earns her Masters degree, are to continue working with museums in the capacity of Public Programming or Museum Education.

Shirley is a retired marine and a substitute teacher. He is a UNCW graduate holding a BA in history. While he has not yet earned his Masters degree, he stated that here is a strong possibility he will do so in the future. He would be inclined, however, to finish his course work at a school having a history department that is more flexible in the area of Applied History. UNCW's history department, he explained, is more concentrated in the area of traditional history.

Shirley stated that he might someday work as a volunteer in a museum, but as a career choice he would be more interested in teaching Museum Culture History.

"I really enjoyed putting together the exhibit," he stated. "It is probably the most exciting thing I've ever done at UNCW."

Sponsors of the exhibit include the UNCW college of Arts and Sciences, the Propeller Club, and the Friends of the Battleship North Carolina.

The exhibit will be on display for six months. It is located in the Memorial's Visitor's Center, and can be viewed free of cost between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Discussion of Traffic Safety To Be Held

BY CAROLE MEHLE
Staff Writer

Ever wonder who really has the right of way at a crosswalk? Who really is the more powerful, the person in the crosswalk or the driver behind the wheel?

These questions will be discussed at an open forum about traffic safety at 7:30, Monday, March 15 in the University Center Ballroom One.

Pedestrians, motorists, and cyclists will be offered the chance to talk about and offer opinions on traffic safety with members of the administration.

Topics of discussion planned for the forum are right of way conflicts and problems in crosswalks. Also on the agenda are bicycle paths and future planning of traffic safety.

Members of the administration who will be on the panel are: Chief of Police Billy Dawson, Student Body President Joe Mitchell, Assistant Vice Chancellor of Business Dick Scott, Dr. Kathleen Jewell of Health and Wellness, and Director of Safety John Geddies.

Though students are aware of the parking rules and regulations—which are handed out by the Parking Office when a student purchases a parking decal—students remain somewhat murky on traffic violations.

The idea for the forum came after Deborah Haywood, coordinator of LivWell Center for Health Promotion, and several other members of the faculty and staff expressed concern about the rules. "There isn't a day that one of us doesn't go without a close call. We're having the traffic forum so that students can ventilate their frustrations, ask questions and get information," to clear the air and learn the rules.

Senior Lynn Benson said, "I think I have an understanding of the rules. Pedestrians have the right of way, but I didn't know that bikes had no rights."

Senior Rob Hassell offered a motorcyclist's opinion about the "rules that don't apply to me," he quipped. "I know who to yield to. I think I have an advantage over everybody else. I get where I'm going quicker. I just go up on the sidewalk or the side of the road."

"I abide by the steps. I probably speed too much. The best thing is that I always have a parking space."

Lieutenant Charles Willis of Campus Police said students have "a fairly general understanding" of traffic laws. Traffic laws are those considered moving violations by the police, running a stop sign or speeding, for example. Willis labeled these as the most violated rules on campus.

One of the most problematic situations for students is who has right of way at the crosswalk, the driver or the cyclist. Willis said the driver does. "The bike has no right of way in a pedestrian crosswalk. The bike is considered a vehicle by the State of North Carolina. The operator must obey traffic laws like a motor vehicle."

Willis said the bicyclist must obey stop signs just like a car.

Though there are moving violations on campus, Willis said parking violations outnumber them. Parking is not a moving offense and the student must obey the rules of the university, Willis said.

Though students far outweigh faculty, they are responsible for some of the violations too. Willis said the violations "cover a wide spectrum. There's no difference between faculty and students or non-university visitors."

Willis also said, "Sometimes there are several violations a day then some none. There's no real average."

At the forum, eight Roadgear Breakaway bicycle helmets will be raffled off by the LivWell Center for Health Promotions. Haywood said the helmets are to kick off a project to get members of the university community to wear helmets. Haywood said that will be an uphill battle.

Haywood said there are 60 helmets that will be available for $8 at LivWell's office in Westside Hall. The funding for the helmets comes from a grant from New Hanover Regional Medical Center.

LivWell and Health and Wellness are involved because of the health aspects of traffic safety. "We've seen a rise in bike injuries. Some of them are treated through Health and Wellness, some are bad enough that they go off campus. Some are not reported at all," Haywood said.

Also involved in the forum are the Student Government Association, the Campus Safety Advisory Board, the Office of the Dean of Students and Student Health and Wellness.

Campus Pharmacy Opens

BY JOHN BRYAN
Staff Writer

UNCW students now have their own pharmacy right on campus. It is located just across the hall at the Student Health Center in Westside Hall.

The pharmacy is an idea that the university has been working on for over 2 years, according to Charles Maimone who is Director of Auxiliary Services for the university. Auxiliary Services is in charge of the pharmacy. The university has researched how other campuses in the UNC system which have their own pharmacies to see how they have been operating them. UNC-Charlotte and UNC-Greensboro are two such campuses that have pharmacies. Lessons learned from these pharmacies have been applied to the pharmacy here. UNCW holds North Carolina Pharmacy permits and Drug Enforcement Agency permits that allow for operation of the pharmacy.

The pharmacy stocks the drugs most often prescribed to students by the Health and Wellness Center. Non-prescription drugs are also sold along with various health aids. Students are also able to rent items such as crutches when needed. An aspect of the pharmacy that Mr. Maimone is particularly excited about is that it makes it easier for students to pay for certain kinds of shots they receive from the Health and Wellness center. "Rather than walking across campus to James Hall to pay the cashier," Mr. Maimone says,

The pharmacy operates on a "break even" basis, according to Mr. Maimone. He says, "The pharmacy is not there to turn a profit." The state has contracted with a wholesale pharmaceutical company to supply the drugs to be sold. Also, the university has contracted with Cape Fear Memorial Hospital provide UNCW with a pharmacist. The university felt this would be the best way to go during its learning period with pharmacy operation.

Pharmacist Valerie Tingley is excited about working at the new pharmacy. She recently moved to Wilmington from Indiana where she earned her pharmacy degree from Purdue University. "I really enjoy being back in a university setting," she said, adding, "Wilmington is such a beautiful city." She said student response to the pharmacy so far has been very positive.

Mr. Maimone is upbeat about the new pharmacy. He says, "The pharmacy is especially good for students who have no transportation." He also sees the ID Plus system as an option students can use for payment in the future. He says, "It was decided to implement the system at a later time due to equipment situations that would have postponed its opening."

Operating hours of the pharmacy are from 8:30 to 5:00 Monday through Friday. The pharmacy will also operate during the summer sessions, however, operating hours have not been decided as of yet.

SGA Elections Next Week, Vote!

Postle Student Government Association (SGA) elections will be held Sunday and Wednesday on campus. If things remain the same, only 7% of the student population eligible to vote will.

76111 That is a ridiculously low number. In last year's Spring election, only 618 of the roughly 8,100 students voted.

So for this year, SGA has received $586,985 in operational funding requests for 1993-94 from 31 clubs and organizations, the Association for Campus Entertainment, the Student Media Board, Student Government Office Operations, Student Legal Services, the Seahawk Shuttle, and the Executive Budget. This is student money and the members of the Senate allocate funds for these organizations.

Much like the federal government, most people don't want anything to do with SGA until they want something. That is not what government, be it student or above, is for. Student Government should be for, of, and by the students. SGA is that, but not enough students participate in it. This election features five offices that are uncontested, only one person is running for the seat.

If you do not know what each of the candidates would like for SGA to do next year, or you want to ask the candidates about a certain issue in person, there will be a candidates forum on Monday, March 15, at 5 p.m.

Remember, SGA officials are responsible to the student body, they are representatives of the students. The best way to ensure what you want SGA to do gets done is to vote in the election for the candidate who best represents your views and goals.

Just like with the federal election, if you don't vote, you have no right to complain about what SGA does. Now is your chance to voice your opinion.

To Men's B-ball team: Thanks for a great season!

The men's basketball season came to a disappointing end on Sunday afternoon, a 55-50 loss to East Carolina University, in the Richmond Coliseum, but that loss should not take anything away from the fact the team had a helluva exciting year.

We got to see three seniors show their mettle and lead the team to a 17-11 record. Tim Shaw dominated play in the USAir East Coast Basketball Classic, Keith Adkins bombed N.C. State into submission, and Reggie Vemey drove Richmond from the CAA tournament. While there is still an outside shot at a National Invitational Tournament slot, thinking about next year's team is exciting. Though this year's seniors will be tough to replace, on paper, next year's team looks as good or better. Corey Stewart, Cannon Baker, and Preston McGriff should have an immediate impact on the team.

Chris Jones, Drew Phillips, Chris Meighen, and Baker will form a solid guard lineup that can hit the three and dish out assists as well as play solid defense.

Coach Kevin Eastman has repeatedly said he is comfortable here and does not plan to leave, despite rumors he is a candidate for the University of Richmond vacant coaching position.

So, before we close the door on this year's team and look forward to next year's, let's say thanks to this year's team.

Letter to the Editor

Editor:

I attended the [men's basketball] home game against Charleston. I have season tickets and attend all the home basketball games. I think that the support that our team gets from our students, employees, and the general public is wonderful and a team that works so hard deserves our support.

I must tell you, however, that I was extremely embarrassed for our students that night. Some new fan to have their own game of throwing a roll of toilet tissue from one side of the stands to the other and then across to the goal end of the stands. So many of the students were so intent on watching where the paper landed that they were ignoring much of what happened on the court at that time. When one guy threw the roll so high up that it landed on the catwalk over the stands, the crowd around me (on the opposite side from the students) stopped making derogatory comments about what was going on and applauded the fact that the roll was out of sight. Unfortunately, this didn't stop their game. Someone

What exactly is the "real world"?

I am writing this article on the day between Monday, where President Clinton gave some indication of his economic program and the sacrifices that will be called for, and Wednesday when he will lay out his program in detail before Congress.

It strikes me that we are at a momentous crossroads in the evolution of our country's history. It seems clear to all that significant change has to happen if our economy is to regain any sense of balance between meeting our needs and providing for the needs of our children. The political and economic decisions of the 1980s were all based on the achievements of short-term goals. It is becoming increasingly clear to more people that other policies must be pursued in light of the national debt and the wide range of significant environmental problems that lay on the doorstep of our immediate future.

President Clinton is speaking quite clearly of the necessity of sacrifice on the part of most Americans and obviously realizes how difficult it is to self sacrifice to people whose number one concern is their personal welfare. The only time that we have willingly sacrificed for the sake of our country has been in times of war and that image is being called upon as we face the challenge with which we are faced. I believe President Clinton is absolutely correct in calling upon us to deal with the changes that are demanded by including long-term goals and policies in our plans. Our individualism and the resulting ethic that focuses totally on what any decision is going to cost me is logically self-defeating in the long run on a personal as well as economic and political level. We are part of a national community and, increasingly, an international community.

President Clinton is going to make the best logical case that he can for changes that will effect all of us. Beyond logic, I am convinced there are appropriate motivations in making such changes that have spiritual roots. A spiritually healthy person is constantly seeking to ground behavior and values and decisions in some universal principles that seem to ground us in truth and goodness. From my spiritual heritage and personal reflection I believe that we do indeed need to see ourselves as part of a whole. We are a global family and are discovering in ways that we never imagined that events that take place in far off countries eventually have impact on us whether it is the possibility of troop involvement in Bosnia or the burning of the rain forest in Brazil. We are all of one blood and need to make decisions in light of our being part of this human community. We are also stewards of this earth and, for the first time, have within our power the destruction of our planet through policies that cause a variety of environmental degradation. Vice President Al Gore, in his book Earth in the Balance, sees the spiritual dimensions of this issue. He writes, "The more deeply I search for the roots of the global environmental crisis, I am convinced it is an outer manifestation of an inner crisis that is, for lack of a better word, spiritual.... What other word describes the collection of values and assumptions that determine our basic understandings of how we fit into the universe?" It is no longer viable to see ourselves as masters of this planet, able to use its resources without counting the cost. We are stewards, persons able to choose to operate with ethical values that move beyond pure self interest to find that working for the welfare of the larger community also meets our own needs.

Beyond the spiritual values of seeing ourselves called to be the stewards and caretakers of our earth and its people, it takes spiritual awareness to discover that the consumerism which causes us to hunger after the "lifestyles of the rich and famous" is an addiction that, like all addictions, is self-defeating. As Vice President Gore notes, "The accumulation of material goods is at an all-time high, but so is the number of people who feel an emptiness in their lives." And it is this consumerism that drives our industrial, technological, corporate machine which makes dealing with reducing governmental spending, dealing with the national debt and cleaning up the environment so very difficult. Again, to quote Vice President Gore, "The froth and frenzy of industrial civilization masks our hunger for that communion with the world that can lift our spirits and fill our senses with richness and immediacy of life itself." What we discover spiritually is that making these hard choices is to act in our own best self-interest.

Eighteen of us from UNCW went to the Bahamas during spring break on a sailboat without watches, radios, televisions, mall order catalogues, alcohol or schedules. Every time we do this and return to Miami, someone will comment sarcastically, "Welcome back to the real world."

Then someone will observe that where we have been for this past week of beauty and wonder and peace is the true "real" world and the world to which we are returning is the world that is skewed and distorted. It is on a sailboat in blue/green water that we can get in touch with truths of the Spirit. The messages that often come to us from our culture and even from our education are distortions about which values are important and often times outright lies.

Perhaps, if we could discover the spiritual realities that underlie the design for human life on this planet, a life that is designed to generate a sense of well being, then the hard choices that need to be made might not seem so difficult or threatening.

Patriotic

Nassau, Bahamas—Still no word yet on the whereabouts of the cruise ship Valdeaz, which has been missing at sea for nearly a week. Reported among those missing is would-be movie star and NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith. The latest news is that a bottle was discovered off the coast of North Carolina and reportedly contained the following message:

"Greetings from the Bermuda Triangle. The weather is really great down here and all of us on the ship have decided to stay. You can dispel all of the myths about mystic forces holding people down here, it's just so nice that no one wants to leave (especially with more mid-term exams coming up).

You wouldn't believe who all is hanging out here either. I've seen Elvis, Hitler, Jimmy Hoffa, and the entire cast from Gilligan's Island. I understand that Salmon Rushdie had been here for a few years and recently left to publish a sequel to his controversial Satanic Verses entitled How to Outlive the Ayatollah."

Anyhow, I, being the caring columnist that I am, have prepared a little something to brighten your return from Spring Break. And now I present, for your reading enjoyment, my Top Five Things To Do During Spring Break 1993. (All, some, or none of which I may or may not have done myself.)

1. Visit world renowned "John Lee's Tractor Museum," located in the outskirts of metropolitan Pink Hill, North Carolina.

2. Invite the guys over to watch "Bikini Island." Honestly you won't have to see just how ridiculous this B-class horror/skin flick is. (The murderess used a plunger to kill people.)

3. Spend the week at cousin David's resort/out-compound in Waco, Texas. Stay the heck away from Waco, Texas!!

4. Take a trip to New York City and hang out in World Trade Center. (This could be a bust!!)

5. Spend the week at home in Dabrun County, watching reruns of The People's Court and consuming mass quantities of Ho-Cake.

Actually, I sat in front of the Macintosh all week trying to come up with a somewhat amusing, semi-coherent bit of writing for this issue. As you can see, it was not the most productive week of my life.

In other news, do you remember in my last issue how I touched on the subject of the new "musical condom"? Well, they're now come out with something even wilder. It is the newly patented, highly controversial, United States Flag Condom. Yes folks, some glory is producing an "old Glory" line of prophylactics, complete with a United States flag printed on the side. I can already envision all of the jokes about "standing at attention" and "flying at half-mast." Go figure.

Hats Off this week goes to a friend of mine, Trooper W.L. Taylor of the Wake County division of the North Carolina State Highway Patrol. Trooper Taylor turned what could have been a quite lucrative event for my insurance company into a "stern warning." I probably shouldn't have mentioned this here in the column but after all, I did promise him a Hats Off Award. So if you run into Trooper Taylor anytime soon, then tell I said "Hats Off." (I was only speeding back to Wilmington so as to make my deadline with The Seahawk.)

The Shoes Off award this week goes to whoever the Ingrave was that infected me with the influenza virus last week. Influenza, in case you've never had it, is NOT the best way to spend your Spring Break. Shoes Off to the Virus Vector.

Well friends, that about wraps things up for this exciting edition of this utterly disgusting column. As usual, your comments, suggestions and money are always welcome. Address them to me in care of The Seahawk.

Until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Clinton's economic plan in for long battle

On Wednesday, February 17, President Bill Clinton presented the American people and a joint session of the Congress with his combined economic stimulus and deficit reduction package.

Clinton took almost an hour to deliver a broad and complex package that would change the taxation and spending policies of the federal government. The package is ambitious and will require a skillful performance by Clinton if it is to be enacted.

The deficit reduction portion contains tax and spending changes. Some tax changes are designed to reduce the level of borrowing required by the federal budget. These changes include an energy tax targeted at all forms of energy consumption and based on the heat value of the source, an increase in the top personal tax rate from 31% to 36%, an increase in corporate tax rates to 36%, and reducing the tax deductibility of some corporate expenses. Most Americans will bear some tax increase, but the dollar values are much higher for those receiving the greatest incomes. The spending changes include a freeze on federal pay in fiscal 1994 and a cap on increases in following years, saving about $8.3 billion, a cut in 100,000 federal jobs, saving about $7.9 billion, and $247 billion in cuts over four years. These changes contribute to controlling the deficit.

The stimulus portion of the package includes $30 billion for programs and projects to put people to work quickly. For the longer term view, he proposes $160 billion in spending and altered tax regulation that would go to education, health care, and investment incentives to encourage corporate research and development. More spending increases the deficit but Clinton sees these increases as contributing to economic growth in the long term and, consequently, lowering the deficits that would otherwise be expected for the next few years.

The proposals were a response to a number of problems that have been developing over the last several administrations. While Clinton's motives, content, and goals of these proposals are complex and not easily disentangled, there are some readily identifiable aspects.

Clinton wants to encourage economic growth and reduce the size of the deficit. But this is risky in the current political economy. As many conservative politicians point out, since the national government is already planning to spend in excess of $1.4 trillion, we already have a highly stimulated economy. Additional stimulation could actually be excessive and cause the economy to outstrip unemployed resources, reawakening the high inflation of the 1970s. This, in turn, would have a further impact on the deficit by increasing the costs of servicing the deficit. More inflation, higher interest rates, and more existing revenues going to the deficit lead to a continuing problem.

Some conservative politicians point out that the American government may too often stimulate the economy by increasing spending. They argue that there are options. In lieu of spending increases, government could try revenues and spending decreases. This is something like what the 1980s were like. Their opponents respond that it was this very strategy which produced $3 trillion in increased debt in 1980's and little else of lasting economic value. They argue that the policy failed because tax cuts were politically popular while spending cuts were politically unacceptable.

Clinton's task becomes even more complex as other goals are added to deficit reduction and economic stimulation. Clinton wants to alter the content economic activity. One element in the elections was "do you like the low paying, minimum benefit, service sector jobs that were created in the 1980's? Or do you want to see a return to increasing really prosperity for all, and not just a few?" Enough people said "No" rather than "Yes" and Clinton was elected. To satisfy his supporters' expectations, he must do more than provide short-term stimulation. He must do more than provide make-work jobs for short term benefit and must increase the creation of, borrowing Ross Perot's phrase, "world class" jobs.

He has a major political challenge. While divided party government has ended, the democrats are far from a well disciplined political machine. He must be sensitive to the demands of supporters. And, given the thinness of his party majority, he may try to reach out to opponents in Congress. There already have been changes in strategy as the deficit reduction portfolio is scheduled for early consideration and the stimulus package has been postponed. There are likely to be further changes. While Clinton's speech was one of the longest in many years, it was only the beginning.

SGA ELECTION 1993

The Student Government Association will hold its Spring elections on March 16 and 17. Students may vote from 11 a.m. until 2 p.m. at the University Center and at Randall Library or at Wagoner Hall from 11 a.m. until 1:45 p.m. and from 4:30 p.m. until 6:45 p.m. All registered UNCW students are eligible to vote.

Students will choose the new student body president, vice president, attorney general, student services coordinator, and senators. The senate seats that are up for re-election are the class officers and the spring representatives at large. Other members of student government will either be appointed by the new administration or elected in the fall.

A candidates forum will be held at 5 p.m., March 15, in Wagoner Hall. Candidates will be asked questions by a panel of students and administrators including Dr. William Bryan, vice chancellor for student affairs.

Allison Chambers, SGA executive assistant and a student on the panel, said, "I think it's important for students to find out what the candidates stand for. Often, a person is elected by popularity instead of by what he can do for the student body."

Students are still eligible to run for office as a write-in candidate. According to Mary Taylor, election board commissioner, "The elections are by no means closed until 3 days prior to the elections." In order for a student to become a write-in candidate, he or she must inform the Student Government Association within three days of the first day of elections.

There are several write-in candidates seeking office in this election. There are three positions in this election that have no candidates registered. The Senior class vice president, and the two Junior class senators have no registered candidates. However, there are students planning to become write-in candidates for these positions.

In addition, five seats are uncontested and write-ins can be filed for these seats as well. The attorney general, Junior class president and vice president, and the Sophomore class president and vice president positions only have one candidate.

Any person wishing to become a write-in candidate for any position should file in the SGA office by 5 p.m., Thursday, March 11.

The positions not listed or pictured below were left out because they were uncontested. Refer to the sample ballot for all candidates except the write-in candidates.

NORTH CAROLINA AZALEA FESTIVAL PRESS RELEASE

Whether singing pop, soul, jazz, blues or gospel, the rich baritone voice of Lou Rawls is as distinctive and instantly recognizable as any in music. Rawls will headline the North Carolina Azalea Festival at Wilmington's Queen's Coronation Pageant and Gala Show on Saturday, April 3, 1993 at 8:00pm at Trask Coliseum on the campus of UNCW.

The three-time Grammy Award-winner launched his solo recording career in 1962 with his smoky jazz debut album I'd Rather Drink Muddy Water. While his rendition of Stormy Monday made the mark, it was Love Is A Hurtin' Thing in 1966 which launched Rawls to the top of the recording charts.

Before the work "crossover" had been used, Rawls became a crossover success as the song hit #1 on the R&B chart and #13 on the pop side. It was also twice Grammy-nominated for both "Best R&B Recording" and "Best R&B Solo Vocal Performance."

In his first two decades, Rawls could claim a gold single You'll Never Find (Another Love Like Mine), one platinum album, and four gold albums. At one point, he had five albums on the charts simultaneously and in the late 1970's he even had his own one-man show on Broadway.

Rawls became the corporate spokesperson for Anheuser Busch in 1976 which led the company's sponsorship of two events in 1980 that continue to this day. One is a series of concerts for American military personnel on bases around the world. The other is the "Lou Rawls Parade of Stars" television which raised nearly $100 million for the United Negro College Fund.

In 1982, Rawls moved into children's programming when he became the singing voice of the animated cartoon character Garfield. He continues to be the musical star of Garfield specials.

Tickets are now on sale at the North Carolina Azalea Festival Ticket Office located at Independence Mall. For more information on tickets dealing with the festival, call the ticket office at (919)763-0905.

Flotsam and Jetsam Lack Originality

BY TODD ALLRED
Music Correspondent

I have been listening to heavy metal music for a long time now. When I was eight years old, I'd save my allowance for weeks to get the latest Kiss Album. In ninth grade, I first heard Metallica's "Ride The Lightning." Soon, "thrash metal" was starting to get popular, with groups such as Megadeth, Anthrax, and Slayer following Metallica's lead.

Another band to garner some attention has been Flotsam and Jetsam; partly because their former bassist extraordinaire Jason Newsted left to jam with Metallica, and partly because they're a talented bunch of musicians who deserve recognition.

Flotsam and Jetsam has actually been around for quite a while now. Their first album Doomsday for the Deceiver was released back in 1986, when Newsted was still playing bass and writing the majority of the group's songs. Since then, they've released two "so-so" albums, No Place for Disgrace and When The Storm Comes Down. On Disgrace, the sound was pretty good, but the songs were weak. Poor production marred Storm, and the band had to switch bassists for the second time when Troy Gregory left to join Prong.

Despite all the adversity, Flotsam and Jetsam stuck with it and just recently released their fourth album, Cuatro. This time, the only thing that's off the mark is the band's timing. Despite the growing popularity of Metallica and Megadeth, the thrash metal genre has not offered much of anything new lately. As a result, in my opinion at least, this form of music has gotten tiresome very quickly. Unfortunately, Cuatro doesn't add any originality to the genre.

Cuatro is, however, a powerful thrash metal album. Neil Kernon's production is both crystal clear and savagely heavy. The brutal opener "Natural Enemies" really cranks as loud as anything I've heard in recent memory, while "Forget About Heaven" sports exceptional fretwork by dual guitarists Edward Carlson and Michael Gilbert. In fact, the guitars are great throughout, and Eric A.K. sings much more in tune this time around. Much of the pervious release STORM was marred by vocals that were so off-key that it was hard to listen without wincing. Cuatro's standout is without question "Swatting at Flies," where Eric A.K. vents all his frustrations and regrets that almost anyone can identify with.

Frustration and anger are prevalent themes on the album and are conveyed by the combination of careful song writing, brutal music, and honest, personal lyrics. No stupidity or superficiality here.

As I said before, there is really nothing groundbreaking about Cuatro, but it is Flotsam and Jetsam's finest work to date. If you are a fan of the genre then there is a whole lot to like on this album. It's far better than the latest by Megadeth or Slayer. If you don't like your music loud, as I sometimes do, then this ain't for you!

Overall rating: B+ (The only minus points come from lack of originality.)

Not "Reflexing" Anymore

BY CAROLE MEHLE
Music Correspondent

Just when you thought it was safe to tune back into MTV, they're back. Duran Duran, the teenybopper darlings of the '80s have come screaming into the '90s with their best album to date, simply titled Duran Duran. Yes, their best album to date. Duran Duran have matured since their "Hungry Like The Wolf" and (to make Neal happy) "Reflex" days of slick teen-oriented hits. They have survived three less-than-stellar albums (Notorious, Big Thing and Liberty) and returned with a work that took them three years of polishing, perfecting and rethinking.

Duran, once the darlings of MTV, open their album with a song that has MTV with both barrels. As bassist John Taylor told E! Entertainment Television, "Too Much Information" is a song that was about the over-commercialization of television but turned into an anti-MTV song. In the early '80s there was a "marriage" between MTV and Duran; both became popular. MTV's fame held sturdy and Duran, after regrouping from splinter groups Arcadia and Power Station, and losing two members, went on to be ignored by the video channel. Though Duran is not an angry band, there is obvious anger tinged in this very danceable song.

Though Duran was angry at MTV, that anger has been vindicated with the band's comeback hit, "Ordinary World." (And it is a hit, Neal, oh ye who said it wasn't!) The band reclaims their place at the top of the charts with a mid-tempo song about finding one's way back to the normal life that was lost. Listen carefully for clever little lyrical quirks, like "Where is my friend when I need you most? Gone away." As the lyrics show, it is one of lyricist and vocalist Simon LeBon's most personal songs. As he told MTV, the song is about losing a lifestyle of fame and fighting to get it back. Quite ironic that their comeback hit is about regaining fame.

Next up is "Love Voodoo," a song about sex. It is a hot song; every time I hear it I want to rip someone's clothes off (preferably one of the more choice male members of the student body). But then who can blame me with lyrics like "You peel me like an onion skin?" This is the type of song that turns up on every Duran album, a song with steamy lyrics and a great chord progression. Two examples are "All Along The Water" from the lackluster Liberty and "Hold Me" from Notorious.

Though "Love Voodoo" is natural progression for Duran, "Drowning Man" is not; it strays from the usual bass-oriented repertoire and into techno, house and dance—styles that have been all the rage in Duran's native England for quite a while now. Very danceable yet very political (about the downfall of the American way) at the same time, it could easily become a big hit in dance clubs.

On to the very quick, less than a minute blip "Shotgun." It is a very sarcastic commentary on gun control and violence, complete with gunshots resounding in the background. Though critics accuse the entire album of being a rip-off of Prince's style, this is the only track that comes remotely close.

"Shotgun" leads into "Come Undone," the next single from the album, due out March 22. It is a song about, as it says, coming undone and falling into pieces. The song is very soulful and definitely hit material. Watch out, this is a hot song. LeBon's vocals make the song and Taylor's bass groove doesn't hurt either. This is in the same mellow vein as the bands "Save A Prayer" from Rio, "A Matter of Feeling" from Notorious and Big Thing's "Too Late Marlene," all songs worth a spin.

Side one closes off with the Latino "Breath After Breath." It is somewhat reminiscent of Duran branch band Arcadia. LeBon turns in some amazing lyrics like "the dance is to the rhythm of the rain, the song is of the planets." Partly in Portuguese, Brazilian megastar Milton Nascimento guests with Duran on this track. Although the song is good, the mixture of languages detracts from it.

Side two opens with "UMF," a song about former Playboy model and twenty-year old British starlet/sexy pot Amanda DeCadenet, once known in Britain as "The Wild Child," now known as Mrs. John Taylor. This is definitely a hot song and the title is even hotter, ultimate mind f---k. This is one of Duran's sexier songs, sexier even than the X-rated "Girls on Film." Definitely a releasable song.

"UMF" is followed with another song that could just as easily describe DeCadenet. Duran, taking a suggestion from Frank Zappa, former boss of guitarist Warren Cuccurullo, remade the Velvet Underground's "Femme Fatale." Though the majority of my Duran friends prefer the Violent Femmes' version of this song, Duran does a great version. However, this is coming from a person totally unfamiliar with the previous two versions. It is placed perfectly on the album, since it can so easily describe DeCadenet, Jack Nicholson's favorite new "little tease," as the song would say.

No, the next track neither describes DeCadenet nor the fast-talking skills of the student body of UNCW. "None of the Above" is a song about choosing to be alone in placing faith in certain causes.

"Shelter" is a mid-tempo song about needing security in a world where it is absent. LeBon's lyrics offer a very vivid image of a prostitute working a cold, vicious road.

Though LeBon offers refuge to a cold hooker in the previous track, he leaves Duran's former manager Peter Rudge in the cold with "To Whom It May Concern." The song, bordering on punk is a funny song with lyrics telling Rudge "was fired because he promised as f--- lyrics say "Boys, I'll get you more, but you gotta pay me by the hour." Rudge got them nothing but a major flop when Liberty received no publicity. The lyrics also tell how Rudge "sue" the band's royalties, stimulating a lawsuit against him. Le Bon dismisses Rudge by calling him "a dicky bird" and a bore who thinks he's a superpower. LeBon and Duran formally tell their manager goodbye in this song.

They bid their fans good-bye with one last political anthem called "Sin of the City." Once again, the lyrics tell a story—this time a tragedy about the Happyland club fire that destroyed a warehouse owned in part by the husband of actress Kathleen Turner. The story tells that the coast check girl had an argument with a Cuban who torched the club. Because there was no fire exit, 89 were killed and 5 survived the club that had been deemed a fire hazard, breaking plenty of fire codes—like several other buildings that were owned by the proprietors, numbering the code violations at about 400, according to the New York Post. "Sin of the City" is very reminiscent of "Proposition" from Notorious and "Downtown" from Liberty.

Well worth a mention is the artwork Duran includes with the album. The cover boasts wedding pictures of the band members' parents, an idea from keyboardist Nick Rhodes. Because of the artwork, the album was tagged "The Wedding Album" by Cuccurullo.

"The Wedding Album" CD boasts a booklet with artwork for each song, incorporating the lyrics; the cassette boasts artwork for each song that in some cases differs from the CD artwork. Some of the art included with the album is a picture to accompany "Femme Fatale" drawn by Rhodes' six-year-old daughter Tatjana. Rhodes also contributes two photos, a postcard (one that he poses with appears in the cassette, a different one appears in the CD) and collaborates on computer generated photos of the band. Taylor gets in the act by contributing a photo for "UMF."

This is a strong album that will win over new fans to the new Duran. The band said the album is self-titled because it is a rebirth for them. How right they are. Stop by Schoolkids Music or one of the other area record stores and give this self-titled long-player a spin. You just might like it.

N. Illinois U. Rates Condoms

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

Northern Illinois University's health center distributed 35,000 condoms to be judged by students for "appearance, sensuality, comfort, smell, tastes, lubrication and sense of security," but not everyone was pleased by the Great Condom Rating Contest.

Health officials said the Feb. 22-26 event was supposed to promote safe sex and AIDS awareness. But critics said it simply promoted behavior that spreads disease and charged that the contest literature may have misrepresented the condom failure rate among college-age users.

The free condom packages distributed by the Health Services Department included seven different brands and types packed with a questionnaire and a folder on the proper use of condoms.

"We copied the idea directly from Stanford," said contest coordinator Michael Haines of Health Services. "The contest provides feedback so we can find out student preferences, while we give them educational materials discussing risks."

The Stanford project has had a return of 5-10 percent over the past four years. "But we are hoping for more than that," Haines said.

Haines said that free condoms, paid for by student fees, have been available for the past five years. Students can find them in fishbowls at health centers, Greek houses and residence halls.

"The contest helps us find out which condoms students prefer, which helps ensure greater usage," Haines said.

"We have cut the chlamydia rate on this campus in half since 1989, and increased condom use three times. Condom use has gone from 15 percent to 42 percent, so we have some solid data that says usage and availability is associated with controlling transmissible disease," Haines said.

Not everyone agrees with the idea of handing out free condoms.

"STDs and AIDS are behaviorally transmitted diseases, and this contest does nothing to discourage the behavior that spreads them," said Scott Stocking, director of the Christian Campus Ministry, who asked students to boycott the contest.

Stocking said he was concerned that literature enclosed with condoms underestimated the rate of condom failure in the 20-24 age group.

"In the Planned Parenthood literature I read, condom failure among 20 to 24 year olds is between 19 to 36 percent. The industry says with perfect use, condoms in that age group only fail at a rate of 1-2 percent," Stocking said. "I think students have a false sense of security about condoms. Abstinence is the only safety from STDs and AIDS."

Haines said abstinence is one of the choices recommended to students who enlist the service of the Health Services Department.

The contest was financed in part by a grant from an Illinois HIV awareness project funded by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta. The results of the contest have not been tabulated.

Students Take Stand Against Sexual Violence With Rally

BY LISA BRINSON
Staff Writer

Come dusk Tuesday, the UNCW campus will experience a bit more excitement than the usual weekday night. On the evening of March 16, a group of a few hundred will begin parading from the steps of Randall Library, through the residence life areas and on to the Gazebo, where a rally will be held.

Christened Take Back the Night, the march and rally is a campus and community-wide event being held to encourage men and women to unite in a stand against sexual violence, a social problem facing both sexes. The theme of the event is "reclaiming the right to live without fear."

Take Back the Night marches and rallies originated in England in response to the fear that so many women had when walking dark streets in the night. In 1978, the United States held a march and rally in San Francisco. Since then occurrences of the events have grown steadily as support has been generated for public involvement.

The second march on campus in recent years, UNCW students Kim Timmons and Lisa Picklesimer are acting as coordinators. The event will be sponsored by Student Activities, Alternatives!, Students Against Rape (STAR), SGA, Gay and Lesbian Association, ARA Campus Dining Services and The Seahawk. Off campus sponsors include the Rape Crisis Center, Domestic Violence Shelter and National Organization of Women (NOW). Refreshments at the rally will be provided by the Pepsi-Cola and Vic's Popcorn.

Diane Edwards of Alternatives! reports student involvement has been "very strong, very good" and coordinators are "hoping for a good turnout. We want people who are concerned about sexual violence. The goal of the event is for everybody to get involved and speak out against senseless violence. Stopping sexual assault will take everyone's involvement."

All students, faculty, and staff are urged to participate in "Take Back the Night" on March 16. Participants are asked to assemble in front of Randall Library at 7:30 p.m. to receive instructions and materials. The march will begin no later than 8 p.m. and proceed to the gazebo on the Residence Life Recreation Field. The rally will begin there at 8:30 p.m. with Bob Haywood, Protestant minister on campus, and Renee McGill of the Domestic Violence Shelter speaking. A list of other speakers is presently being finalized. Musician, Roger Scruggs has donated his time and musical ability for the event.

This is a community-wide effort to increase awareness of sexual violence. "The march is not about women bashing men, rather it is about women and men together speaking out against sexual violence and taking a step to end it," Edwards said.

UNCW Plans "Take Back the Night" Rally

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

Lisa Picklesimer, program assistant for Take Back the Night, extends an invitation to the Wilmington and campus communities to come out and get involved.

Take Back the Night is a march and rally held in cities across the nation to raise awareness in all communities and campuses about sexual violence.

The idea of a Take Back the Night on campus was introduced by Student Team Against Rape after learning that there was a march held in downtown Wilmington in October 1992. The march and rally is targeted to people of all races and sexual identity.

When asked what type of turnout she expected, Picklesimer said, "I expect that there will be a big turnout of supporters. I believe that people are interested, and I hope that a good number of our supporters will be men."

She went on to say that, "We are excited about it, and it will be very informative and emotionally beneficial to those who take part in it. Also, we hope to gain awareness and understanding that there is a problem and action should be taken as a community to obtain faster progress towards a solution."

The goal statement for the March is to reclaim the right to live without fear.

Supporters will meet on the steps of Randall Library at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, March 16, 1993. They will step off 8:00 p.m. and march to the Gazebo where the rally will take place at approximately 8:30 p.m. During the march, supporters will be encouraged to chant positive sayings such as: "No means no, yes means yes, wherever we go, however we dress," and "2-4-6-8, no more violence, no more rape."

Treating Fitness Injuries with "R.I.C.E." of Course.....

The most common fitness injuries are "soft tissue" injuries; sprains, strains, "pulls", and bruises. With the best means of dealing with sports injuries being prevention, accidents do occur, and knowing what to do can help you prevent further damage as well as speed up your recovery. For most soft-tissue injuries, the first-aid treatment is R.I.C.E.: Rest, Ice, Compression, and Elevation.

Rest means restricting movement. Ice means to apply cold compresses to soft tissue to reduce bleeding and swelling by narrowing blood vessels. Compression helps to reduce swelling and blood flow to the injured area. Elevation reduces internal bleeding.

Knowing what to do in cases of injury can make the difference between a fitness injury and a fitness disaster.

"Spring Break in the Backcountry"

Snow, sleet, rain, and sun - we had it all. For Spring Break, the Discover Outdoor Center sponsored two excursions. One group of 12 brave souls headed toward the snow covered mountains of Tennessee. The other group consisted of 9 trip leaders in training, who were venturing toward Shining Rock in the Pisgah National Forest. Both groups were challenged physically and mentally, not only by the weather, but also by the tough terrain. The Tennessee groups' spirits soared even though fuel ran low. The 12 backpackers stuck it out for 6 nights and 7 days.

Meanwhile, the Shining Rock group faced icy trails and hungry skunks while learning valuable hiking and camping skills, such as leadership, wilderness first aid, and no trace camping. Although the weather was a damper, the Shining Rock group came together to learn how to be efficient and effective outdoor trip leaders. Both groups experienced new challenges and adventures, yet returned with new friends and a sense of accomplishment.

Take Back The Night

March Raises Sexual Violence Awareness

BY ROBIN TISINGER
Staff Writer

About 300 hundred people participated in the "Take Back the Night" march and rally on campus Tuesday night. The rally was to raise awareness of sexual violence in the community and on campus.

Marchers began assembling in front of Randall Library around 7 p.m. Volunteers from Student Team Against Rape (STAR) and Rape Crisis Center gave out programs and route instructions. Purple arm bands were given to participants as a symbol of power.

The Rape Crisis Center served 300 victims in our area last year. Some marchers carried signs stating "Speaking Out to End Sexual Violence," and "Sexists, Rapists, Anti-gay, You Can't Take Our Night Away."

The purpose of this march's theme, "Reclaim the Right to Live Without Fear," is to unite men and women to put an end to the fear of sexual violence.

At 8 p.m., the enthusiastic crowd began marching and shouting chants such as, "We Have the Power, We Have the Right, We Have the Will to Take Back The Night!"

Kim Timmons, who helped coordinate the march as part of her senior internship, said she was overwhelmed by the student turnout.

"We need to come together in a diverse group to put an end to sexual violence," she said.

The group marched down the double sidewalks to Cameron Hall and across the street into the campus residences. The chants grew louder as curious students peered through apartment windows.

The march ended at the Residence Life Gazebo where candles were given out to participants. The rally began with an introduction by STAR and Dr. Bill Bryan, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs.

Dr. Bryan said that sexual violence is a major concern for institutions of higher education. By realizing that violence is a serious problem in our society, Dr. Bryan said, "We can join together and stop violence in all forms."

Vickie Stanley, Ann Delgado, and Renee McGill, all rape survivors, spoke out about their experience.

Stanley, who was raped and stabbed seven years ago, said she has had recurrent nightmares about the event. She shared a poem she wrote about her experience. (See page 4).

Delgado spoke of the powerlessness victims feel, but said that we must all grow from being a victim or victimizer to being survivors. "We've got a lot of good work to do," she said.

Power Out On Campus

BY CAROLE MEHLE
Staff Writer

This week, the residents of the on-campus apartments learned a lesson the hard way. Faculty and staff learned the same thing Wednesday. When it comes to power, it is given and can just as easily be taken away.

On campus-apartment's residents joined area natives in suffering a good part of the weekend without electricity. A transformer in front of Hewlett Hall burned Saturday afternoon and it was up to Carolina Power and Light to fix it. The residents survived through a 48-hour wait for electricity, lights and hot water until the power was restored to the buildings at 1 p.m. Monday.

Wednesday several buildings on campus also experienced an outage when an on-campus substation near the University Center blew around 9 a.m. The outage occurred when salt built up on the substation and began conducting electricity. John Geddie, director of safety said that he expected power to be restored by 6 p.m. Wednesday. The outage that downed power in the apartments was caused by the storm that hit Wilmington Saturday, Geddie added.

Power in the apartments was not able to be restored as soon as it was to the rest of campus—late Saturday night—because the apartments are on a different power source than the rest of campus. This service is secondary, whereas the rest of campus is primary, a higher priority and cheaper service. The difference in priority is determined by CP&L.

Director of Housing and Residence Life, Bill McCartney said, "We had to wait for CP&L to repair the lines."

Apartment's Residence Coordinator Tim Hamby said that the university is looking at moving the apartments to the same power source as the rest of the University. McCartney said the apartments would be re-routed to a substation near the Campus Police Station if the move proves to be a cost-effective one.

Some of the residents spent Saturday night in their apartments but on Sunday they were strongly urged to find alternative housing options since the temperature in the apartments was projected to plunge to as low as fifty degrees. Trask Coliseum was opened as an option for students, but the majority of the residents spent the night with friends or in other residence halls. Trask was chosen because of the shower facilities it offered, said Hamby. He added that perhaps the University Union, the center for emergency action, should have been an option for alternative housing.

The university has no rules set up for a prolonged power outage.

Electric Shock.

Not Gas Leak

BY JOHN BRYAN
Staff Writer

Last Thursday around noon, Friday, Bear and Morton Halls were evacuated.

According to Lt. Willis of the Campus Police, it was originally reported that a gas leak had occurred in the vicinity. What actually happened was, workers who were installing the new building identification signs near the buildings struck a main electricity feeder line with the pole digger that they were using. Apparently, onlookers who reported that there was a gas leak to the police confused the white smoke originating from the struck electrical line for gas leaking.

The shorted lines that occurred from the accident were repaired later that day.

Tips For Smooth Graduation

BY AMY BRENNAN
Staff Writer

Graduation news is in the air at UNCW, or rather, in the mailbox. The 834 candidates for spring graduation should check their mailboxes for a "hassle-free tassel."

What is hassle-free tassel? In the bookstore they will tell you, "It's all the poop you need to know."

The tassel tells how to take the hassle out of doing the million and one things that go along with graduation. The one thing that it does not do is find a place to put all the relatives and friends that come to town for the big ceremony May 15.

Since each graduate is only allowed five guests, finding sleeping room for out-of-town guests may not be a problem. However, students have been known to ask (beg?) other students for extra tickets or even buy extra tickets. For those students who do not have enough for space in that tiny apartment that your parents pay for, there are some options.

Wilmington is swarming with motels, hotels, inns, bed and

all the poop you

breakfasts, and condos. Guests can find lodging near campus, in historic downtown Wilmington, or at the beach. Of course, prices will vary considerably depending on location and amenities. The cheapest rate in town is the Motel 6 on Market St. A double room runs $33.38 per night. The only promise they make is to "leave the porch light on for you."

May is the beginning of the peak beach season in the area. Expect prices there to be about twice as high as anywhere else. The Holiday Inn at Wrightsville Beach will run $105 to $125 per night depending on whether the room is poolside or parking lot side. Holiday Inn on Market St. is only $65 per night for a double room. Most of the average motels in town will range from $48 to $68 per night for two people.

For a luxury stay, try Shell Island resort at Wrightsville Beach. All suites are oceanfront and fully equipped. There are indoor and outdoor pools, whirlpools, a fitness center, and a sauna. A weeknight stay costs $160 and a weekend night stay costs $170.

For those who want to relax and be pampered, try one of the quiet inns downtown. The Worth House, Victorian Bed and Breakfast on Third Street claims are several other inns in the area, but they all suggest making reservations early because they have limited space. Some inns even claim they are willing to negotiate prices. Shop around for accommodations that will satisfy your guests.

In the remaining time before graduation, do not forget to study and pay any outstanding debts so that you can graduate!

Second Meltdown Held

BY AMY PETROCELLI
Staff Writer

Spring Break has come and gone, and we're still feeling 30 degree temperatures at night (and seeing an occasional snowfall!). Many are ready to celebrate the end of this mean winter, and welcome spring. For brothers of Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity, this celebration has been in the planning stages for nearly a year. The Pi Kappa Phi Spring Meltdown Festival, a fund-raiser for the handicapped, will be held on March 27 from 12-6pm at Hugh MacCrae Park.

This second annual Meltdown is an event for the entire community, explained Will Mitchell of Pi Kappa Phi. The festival will feature bands Captain Cook and the Coconutz, and reggae band, Imami. Other events will include a dunking booth, games, door prizes donated by Boseman's sporting goods, and "a few extra surprises that we're not letting people know about until that day," said Mitchell.

Mitchell explained that the fraternity has taken the planned festivities a step further than last year. The festival attracted

Schweitzer Week Comes To Close

UNCW NEWS

The Albert Schweitzer International Prizes will be awarded at 8 p.m., Thurs., March 18, in Kenan Auditorium on the campus of The University of North Carolina at Wilmington. The ceremony will be followed by a reception in Wagoner Hall. Both events are free and open to the public.

The prizes are awarded every four years by the N.C. Educational, Historical, and Scientific Foundation, Inc., to individuals worldwide who reflect Dr. Schweitzer's philosophy of "reverence of life." The prizes recognize excellence in medicine, the humanities, and music, the three areas in which Schweitzer excelled.

The truly international slate of prize winners represents Costa Rica, England, and Senegal. Prize winner for music is Brother Dominique Catta, a Benedictine monk who has been instrumental in creating a new tradition of religious music in West Africa that blends African melodies with the Gregorian chant, lending potency and meaning to Christian liturgy in predominantly Moslem Senegal.

Prize winner for humanities is Robert Muller, the "father of the United Nations" and first chancellor of the United Nations-established University for Peace in Costa Rica, who has spent his life advocating a peaceful world without borders.

Prize winner for medicine is Sir John Wilson, whose work has been instrumental in the founding of several world agencies for the prevention of avoidable blindness and other disabilities.

The prize ceremony and the reception that follows will wrap up a week-long celebration of events that will end today on the UNCW campus.

Lighting one candle breaks darkness

The following remarks were given on the "Take Back the Night" rally, Tues. March 16 on the UNCW campus.

Darkness...night...harbinger of evil of violence of fear. In our world there is much of darkness: darkness in Bosnia/Herzegovina, darkness in the violence of South Africa, darkness in the smoke of the burning rain forest of the Amazon, darkness in the continuing racism of our own nation, darkness in the expanding fears generated by economic dislocation, ... darkness! When we think about issues, critical issues that are often outside our personal experience, our most common response is a feeling of impotence. What can we do to make a difference?

Darkness...night...harbinger of evil of violence and of fear. Formally who have received the violence through sexual abuse, child abuse, rape, gender oppression, homophobia, racism; for any who have been victimized by these forces of darkness, the response is more devastating than impotence; it is impotence exacerbated by fear, shame and anger too often repressed.

So what are we to do in the face of this darkness?

There is an ancient Chinese proverb "It is better to light one candle than to curse the darkness." To light one candle is act of empowerment, it pushes back the darkness. To light many candles is to be in solidarity in our determination not only push back the darkness, but turn the darkness into the light of a new day. Whether we come here tonight and light a candle as an act of personal empowerment and assertion of our determination to overcome the darkness within or simply to be in solidarity in pushing back the darkness of sexual assault until it disappears in the light of the new day, I invite you now to light your candle, to claim the light as it comes to you and to stand in witness of the power of light in three minutes of silence as the light is passed one to another.

The focus of this rally is on sexual assault as one form of many forms of violence in our society. It is an issue that belongs to all of us whether we have been victimized or not, whether we are women or men. It takes the actions of one and of the many to achieve the goal of this rally to "reclaim the right to live without fear."

These rallies and marches began first in England as a protest against the fear that women encounter walking the streets at night. The first rally in the United States took place in San Francisco in 1978 and has spread, since then, throughout our country.

Tonight, in gathering together and then lighting our candles we want two things to happen from this symbolic action. First, we want and we hope everyone of you that has ever been victimized by sexual assault in any of its forms to know that you hold a candle that needs to be lit. The darkness of fear and shame or hidden anger can be overcome by your own light, a light that comes as you work intentionally for your own healing through all of the support groups and resources in this campus and larger community who stand willing and anxious to support you so that one day you can tell your story or even if not telling your story in a public way you can become a force for yourself and for the brother and sisters of your own community in saying, "This must stop! Those who do violence must be confronted and called to accountability." Any of you who have ever been violated have rights and we who have not want to support you in claiming those rights and the wholeness and the goodness of life to which you are entitled.

Those of us who have not experienced some form of sexual can also light a candle. A change in this world, large or small, becomes a real possibility for any person who detects a need, decides to do something about it, sets a reachable goal, and perseveres until the goal is met. Remember tonight. When one candle was lit the darkness gave away ever so slightly and as more people followed suit small beacons of light turned into an overall illumination and the darkness was pushed back even further. God often invites each of us to strike a match and light a candle, sometimes the first match and the first candle in dealing with a particular issue.

Something can be done about unjust structures. Martin Luther King proved it in terms of society wide racism. But remember, Rosa Parks lit the first candle in that movement when she simply refused to take her society designated seat in the back of the bus. You can lit your candle where you are. You can isolate one fact of injustice and depression and unite with others who care so as to do something about it. You can reach out you hand in love to one human person, one man, one woman, one child who lives in the darkness in oppression and impotence and fear. It is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness. One candle, one light begins to defeat darkness. Just one. We have done it this evening as a act of empowerment and solidarity. You have power, the power of one act of caring and love or the organized power or corporate caring and love. Either way you can push back the darkness and walk into the light.

"Take Back The Night" is for all

On Tuesday night a special event took place, a march entitled "Take Back The Night." The march was to show, en masse, that people, not just women are angry, frustrated, and fed up with having to worry about their safety when they walk at night.

The march, organized by Kim Timmons, was a huge success. An estimated 350-400 people took part. There were women, men, people of all races, students, faculty, staff, and non-university people present.

The purpose of the march was to unite women and men in hope of putting an end to the senseless crime of sexual assault. UNCW's administration was well represented and urged people to come forward with any suggestions for making our campus even safer.

Ann Delgado, one of the speakers who is a survivor of sexual assault, told the crowd "a lot of good work needs to be done." The key word in that sentence is "good." Any work done to rid our community of sexual violence and its effects is good.

Whether it is volunteering time at the Rape Crisis Center (721 Market St., 341-5799), the Domestic Violence Shelter (P.O. Box 1555, Wilmington, NC, 28403, 343-0703), or on campus in the Alternatives! office (UO 104, 395-3683), any work done is good work.

No job is too small when it comes to preventing or helping a victim recover from this despicable crime.

The title says that this march wasn't for everyone and that is the truth. Some people feel they can't make a difference or just plain don't care. The march was for people who believe a difference can be made.

A male student watching the procession through the apartments asked what the march was about. Student Team Against Rape (STAR) member Tammy Richardson said he should join the group and find out. The male then said, "I can't, there's a good television show on."

That kind of attitude, "Oh, I'd get involved if it really affected me," is the kind that gets people hurt. If you are female, you know the risks and dangers of being out at night.

Some males seem oblivious to the problem of sexual assault. Instead of thinking about themselves, they should consider the perils their girlfriends, sisters, moms, and any other female they know faces everyday.

Rampant Library until closing and no one you know is still in the library. It is not that far a walk, and it is lit, to your room. But, it is midnight and no one is around.

That scenario could fit any situation. It's your mom and she worked late. It's your sister at another college. It's your grandmother and she is walking her dog.

Rapists and sexual assaulters do not care about age, looks, color, or religion, or any other factor, when it comes to committing the crime. It can happen to anyone, at any time.

The time to end the violence is now. We as a community must rise up and "Take Back The Night."

On page 2, there is an ad for personal safety devices. Don Harris, the distributor, spoke at The Seahawk's sexual assault awareness seminar last semester.

Dream Invader by Vickie Stanley

I saw you somewhere in the back of my mind,
A vision vague and obscure.
You haunted my dreams like a ghost in the night,
And left me confused and unsure.

You sailed through my mind, wild and free,
Not caring that you didn't belong.
Saying things I would not understand,
Invading when you should have been gone.

Out of my life you've been banished forever,
Expelled from my world for your lies.
But even so, you haunt my dreams nightly
With the cold, hard look in your eyes.

You've long since passed from my sight and my sense,
You're gone, with your vain lies and schemes.
Your memory is finally fading.....
Except when your face haunts my dreams.

Update: Phil Smith

Phil and his column were blown away this past weekend (Lucky you!). He was last seen by ATF agents as his apartment building flew over Waco, Texas. Look for his "Return From Oz" issue in the coming weeks.

Editor:

I found the opinions in the Channel Marker very fair, yeah right. It was nice to hear an opinion of a biker. I have found that most of the careless and reckless riders have regular bikes, not $400 to over $1000 bikes.

Do you think people with these bikes run into pedestrians so they can spend tons of money replacing a fork or truing a rim?

The leaders of these student organizations need to know what they're talking about when they say a majority. If any of them from another state maybe they have seen the escalators that are wide.

If you notice, the left side is always clear for people running or who need to get some place in a hurry. This is what they need to do with these big sidewalks; divide them into two. One's a walkway, one's a bike path.

I just wanted to say thanks for making all people who mountain bike look bad. To the Channel Marker, maybe you'll think before you print articles like the March 1993 edition.

Actions speak louder than words

Ladies and gentlemen, look at what blacks are given, four pages out of the U.S. history books and one month out of a year for black history (which is the shortest month of the year). This is nothing to be pleased about. But on campus I believe the blacks are pleased. Well, I don't know, the blacks complain about racist actions from white students continuously.

For example, a black female walking home on campus was insulted by four white males who made derogatory sexual comments and yelled the word "nigger." After this hideous incident, she said nothing about it for two weeks. I wonder, did she care?

"Move on them by any means necessary" once said by Malcolm X. So, quit waiting around for special treatment. It looks like blacks on this campus don't care. The blacks haven't kept the NAACP active in three semesters. They'll keep dances and social events on hand, but getting together for important issues is so painful.

North Carolina African American Student Leadership Conference (NCAASLC) took place here and there were more high school students there than black students of UNCW! Of a black student number close to 500, only 27 show up for the conference.

As for the dance after the conference, 66 show up. Sad, just plain sad. All play and no work, want work!

Those great civil rights leaders Martin Luther King Jr., Malcolm X and Jesse Jackson and their work could be considered useless by the actions of blacks on this campus. The key to "Fight the Power" is having the tools to do it. There is no fear of a black movement on this "do-nothing", but have Greek interest meetings and wait on the second month of the year when black history programs should happen every month.

There's power in knowledge and numbers. So black people stop making excuses. You don't want to work for white people, and I see why you don't even work for yourselves. Do something NOW!

Hamby said. McCartney said he does not know of a lot of campuses that prepare for long term power outages like the one experienced this weekend. He said, "We had a hurricane pretty much. We just weren't prepared for it like a hurricane. In that case, we would have evacuated."

McCartney said his staff was as prepared as can be for the situation. The housing staff came in Saturday and worked to keep the residents informed by going door to door. The situation made it more difficult to have a residence assistant on duty and "it made the normal more complicated."

He added the situation was an unusual one. Hamby and Geddie agreed that the situation "caught us totally by surprise." Hamby added that the situation was, "definitely unique."

The residents were, "remarkably patient," McCartney said. "They were appreciative and responded very well to the situation."

McCartney and his staff are now advising students on what to do now that the outage is over. The main piece of advice is to throw away perishable foods that are in refrigerators, like meats and opened dairy goods. One way that students can be prepared in the future in case of prolonged power outage is to have a flashlight on hand since candles are a fire hazard and find an alternate place to stay. "Other than that, there's not a whole lot they can do," McCartney said.

McCartney concluded, "The only time the students seemed disappointed with us was when we were telling them classes weren't canceled Monday."

approximately 1500 people last year. Mitchell stated that the fraternity is hoping to double that figure this year. He said that the fraternity has invited Pi Kappa Phi chapters from all over the east coast. "We're hoping to raise a minimum of around $10,000," he said.

Last year the festival yielded $4000 that Pi Kappa Phi was able to donate to PUSH (People Understanding the Severely Handicapped), their national philanthropy. As a result of the donation, Mitchell explained, Pi Kappa Phi was later able to receive a grant from PUSH that will be donated to Annie Herring Snipe Elementary School of Wilmington. The money will be applied to a "wish list" formulated by Snipe school and sent to PUSH for approval.

Mitchell stated that the fraternity's intentions this year are to donate some money to PUSH and some to Snipe, as opposed to initially donating entire profits to PUSH.

"We're trying to set up an on-going program [with Snipe school]," Mitchell stated, "for example, a big brother/little brother program." But such a program, he explained, requires considerable discussion between the school board, parents, and the Pi Kappa Phi national headquarters.

Mitchell stressed that in whatever capacity the money is spent, it will not be held as profit for the fraternity. "We started Meltdown as a fund-raiser, and we want to keep it that way," he said.

Mitchell explained that the event has been the focus of the fraternity for the entire year. Two months after Meltdown, he said, "We'll get together with civic leaders and sponsors to plan for next year."

Because Meltdown is such a big community event, Mitchell stated that the fraternity is trying to give other greek organizations a fair opportunity to participate in fundraising at the Meltdown festival. "We'd like to get as many organizations involved as possible."

"Last year," he stated, "people were there from ages two -200. This is an opportunity to put on a face for all of the greeks."

"If any greek organization would like to do something that day as a fund-raiser," he said, "they're more than welcome to do it, if it stays within the guidelines of our insurance policy." The chapter has taken out a one million dollar insurance policy for the event.

Mitchell stated that the sororities and the Inter Fraternity Council were contacted regarding the endeavor. As a result, Sigma Sigma Sigma and Delta Zeta sororities accepted the opportunity to have booths set up at the event. The booths are being provided by Pi Kappa Phi, with the agreement that funds raised will be put into "a meltdown pool" and split between philanthropic projects.

Other sororities, Mitchell stated, will contribute to Meltdown in the way of sponsorship.

Dominos Pizza and East Coast Concessions are among other contributors to the event.

Mitchell was confident that "this will be a huge year for Wilmington." He alluded to large annual parties held at other universities and said, "Why not stay in Wilmington and have a good time?"

Tickets for the Pi Kappa Phi Spring Meltdown Festival are $5 in advance and can be purchased Thursday of this week, as well as Tuesday -Friday next week between the hours of 10 and 3pm in the University Center. Tickets may also be purchased from brothers of Pi Kappa Phi. Tickets at the door will be $8.

Greek Happenings

BY JULIE PODLASEK
Staff Writer

Next week will be the kick-off for Greek Week 1993.

The events will begin on Wednesday with co-ed volleyball matches from 3-6 p.m.

That evening at 7:30, there will be an opening convocation, with keynote speaker Maureen Syring, a past National President of Delta Gamma Sorority. Syring is a highly respected and widely known figure in Greek life who has made numerous presentations for IFC, Panhellenic Council, as well as various colleges and universities. She will talk about the potential of Greek life and those things that should characterize a quality Greek system. Syring will call on UNCW's Greek organizations to confront a number of issues such as sexism, diversity, alcohol abuse, risk management, and hazing.

On Thursday, March 25, there will be a "game day" where organizations will compete on an individual basis. Games will include spoons-thru-the-clothes, a water-filled balloon toss, a 4-legged race, and an obstacle course. During the obstacle course one person will get to dive their face into a pan completely filled with whip cream. There will also be a wheel barrow race, pyramid, and a cardboard maze that contestants will get to crawl through on their hands and knees. These events will take place from 4-7 p.m. at the Gazebo.

On Friday, March 26, at 7 p.m., the Greeks will be presenting a Talent Show in Trask Coliseum. Doors will open at 6:30.

On Sunday morning at 9 a.m., groups will battle it out in a Tug-of-War at Johnnie Mercer's Pier. Following this, will be the awards ceremony to wrap up the weeks events. Dead Reckoning will play while awards will be given for volleyball, games, Tug-of-War, and the highest GPA for the Fraternities and Sororities. Also on Sunday, a Greek Man, Greek Woman, and Greek Advisor of the year will all be named and rewarded for their hard work and dedication.

Also happening in Greek affairs is a car wash on March 21, 1993 sponsored by Chi Omega and Delta Sigma Phi. The proceeds will be donated to the renovations of the R: apte Home, a home for handicapped children. It will take place from 1-5 p.m. at Hooters restaurant on Market St. Both groups ask everyone to come out and show their support.

Lastly, congratulations go to Panhellenic Delegate of the Month, Mary Kay Yelverton from Sigma Sigma Sigma.

Business Week Kicks Off

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

It was fourteen years ago that the Cameron School of Business Administration saw a need to show students how to apply what they learn in the classroom to the real world. It began as a two day program, but quickly evolved into a week long program of events. During the week of March 22-26, the legacy continues as the Cameron School of Business Administration will host the 14th annual Business Week.

During Business Week, the faculty of Cameron will turn their classes over to public officials, owners, operators, and management of various businesses. Activities such as this allows business leaders and students interaction in an informal manner. The business leaders will talk about their occupations, career possibilities, and provide informative answers to various questions from their audience.

The week March 22-26 will round out the students education by giving him or her the opportunity to find out about career opportunities in a variety of fields. Also, it will show students that what is learned in course work is, in fact, applied in different types of jobs. Past experiences have shown that students and those who take over the classes benefit from the program. Students are able to make contact with potential employers, enabling employers to make contact with potential employees," said Dr. William Hall, director of the center for Business and Economics Services.

Two very important dates on the Business Week 93 calendar are Wed., March 24 and Thurs. March 25. There will be approximately 42 sessions over these two days with 37 different speakers. On the evening of March 24, there will be a keynote address by Michael D. Donahue, executive vice president of an international advertising firm. This presentation will take place at 7 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. Also, at 6:00 p.m. on the evening of March 25 there will be a keynote address sponsored by the Master of Business Association. Estell Lee, president of The Lee Company in Wilmington, will address MBA classes and interested students and faculty. She will discuss "Economic Development in North Carolina." Kings Dominion in Ashland, Virginia and Carowinds in Charlotte, North Carolina have been purchased by Paramount Communications, Inc. The parks' name changes to "Paramount's King Dominion" and "Paramount's Carowinds" reflect the new ownership. The new owners have created more exhibits and rides to make the theme parks more enjoyable. The Days of Thunder ride simulator attraction, features two 74-seat theaters and actual film footage from the movie Days of Thunder.

The theme park's oldest roller coaster features one train running forward while its twin faces the opposite direction and runs the entire length of the track backward. The Rebel Yell is one of the park's five roller coasters. Both theme parks begin a weekend operating schedule beginning March 27 and continuing through May 30. The parks will be open daily June 1 through September 6. For more information, call 804-876-5000.

Hey Mon! No Problem!

BY D. NEAL LEOPER

This Spring Break was definitely one to remember. Yes, folks, Neal found himself upon a trip to the glorious country of Jamaica for a late February respite. It was definitely a trip I will NEVER forget.

When I told people where I was going for, the typical responses were, "Gee, that's cool!" or "Man, your lucky!" I guess that was true, in between the trip through the political uprising and the trip to the local police station.

After arriving in the Montego Bay airport, I was instructed by resort staff to follow my luggage to make sure it wasn't stolen. Thank goodness I did, because one of the airport porters was wheeling the cart with my luggage to a mysterious car. I purchased a few Red Stripe beers (Jamaica's finest and only brew) to keep the natives out of my face. The free transport to the hotel was full so we received a taxi ride from hell. We checked in to the beautiful Chatwick Gardens hotel and the adventure began. Please note, I use the term "beautiful" very loosely.

Now please, don't get me wrong, Jamaica was a great experience, it's just that the country is not as glamorous as it may seem. The weather was averaging a clear, sunny eighty-six degrees in the daytime and in upper seventies at night. Anyway, by the time we were all unpacked in our room, it was approaching ten o'clock at night and we all got wanted to go out and PARTY! Many people were excited about the prospect of the bar scene because in Jamaica there is no drinking age and plenty for all to drink.

About twenty-two UNCW students were on the trip along with a hundred others and after arriving, we all formed our exploratory groups and headed our separate ways. We hailed our taxi, which in this case, was a 1972 Russian made Lada automobile. Gee, what a fine piece of machinery. Just for future reference, keep in mind that when picking a taxi in Jamaica, you should immediately examine the license plates. If the plates are red, this means that the driver is licensed by the government.

However, if the plates are white or any other color, it's just any normal citizen trying to make a buck. They usually set any price they wish and can take you anywhere they want you to go. And believe me, it seemed that EVERYONE in Jamaica was a taxi driver. We learned never to pay over one dollar for a ride.

During the course of a week at the hotel and around town, we made friends with several drivers and restricted our travels with them. I quickly noticed that the Jamaicans are proud of their cars, which usually range from multi-colored Novas to high priced

Mercedes. They love to take advantage of the American tourists. Keep in mind, Jamaica's number one industry is tourism and they will try ANYTHING to get you to swindle money from you. Most of the people are very jealous of Americans and will haggle everyone they see.

Well, the week went on and most people headed to the beaches. We visited The Doctor's Cave first, which can be found pictured on the back side of the Jamaican fifty dollar bill. Speaking of currency, the exchange rate at the time was twenty Jamaican dollars for every one American dollar. I remember eating at Burger King one afternoon and paying $135.30 for the meal. This is equivalent to a little less than seven American dollars. I was excited about the beaches because they were all topless (some totally nude), the water was clear, and cocaine, heroin, marijuana, mushrooms, acid, and L.S.D. were readily available. If I had a dollar for every time drugs were offered to me, I could pay a semester's tuition at UNCW. And for a guy that hasn't really left the east coast and isn't into the drug scene, it was a real culture shock to be faced with such behavior.

On Monday, the city of Montego Bay hosted a large street festival where the citizens attempted to sell everything they own. One of the members of our party got her wallet stolen and we got to ride in

Tears May Fall

BY STEVE ASHLEY
Movie Correspondent

The Crying Game is a movie that is exactly what the title suggests. Throughout the feature, emotions are stirred, such as confusion, excitement, boredom, happiness, and surprise. Although a very emotional movie, The Crying Game did not appeal to me. The movie was a very profound, in depth look at human emotions with a complete disregard to the sex of the individuals involved. Yes, that means transvestites are present. Is it possible to love someone of the opposite sex even after you discover they are the same sex as yourself? I think not. Of course, this is just my personal opinion.

The movie is deceiving and somewhat boring at first, but picks up momentum after a startling discovery is made. The Crying Game is the most startling movie to be released in a long time.

The movie begins when a group of Irish Republican Army terrorists kidnap an English soldier and hold him hostage. The Irish Army want the unconditional release of one of their own soldiers held by England. Well, the Irish soldier is not released and the terrorists try to kill the hostage. But, a funny thing happens. One of the Irish terrorists develops a friendship with the captive and eventually feels sorry for him. He realized that the hostage was just a pawn in a silly game of politics. This, of course, made it more difficult to kill the English soldier. As it turns out, the hostage escapes, only to be run over by a truck in the process. Before he died, he asked his new friend and captor to go back to London for him and tell his girlfriend how much he loved her. So, the movie's main plot begins here. If you want to know the secret of the movie, you've got to go see it!

The Local Scene

BY MATT JORGENSEN
Entertainment Writer

In the past month or so, I've seen many of the bands that call Wilmington their home. And since we are all residents of this city to one extent or another, I thought I'd clue you in on some of our local music.

One night, I saw a triple bill at The Mad Monk that featured Shake, Shrine, and Two Headed Dawg. Shake played first and their style impressed me immensely. They have this awesome blend of classic rock and progressive sounds and in the end, it comes out not only strong, but with style as well. Fans of Smashing Pumpkins and Jane's Addiction will love this band.

Next up was Shrine. This was the second show of theirs that I had seen and both times I was left awestruck. They have a style and sound similar to Phish and The Grateful Dead that inevitably settles on you like a bug. It makes your body move to the groove! Their lineup includes the usual instruments in a band, but they add a second percussionist and a violinist to really spice things up.

To finish off the right, Two Headed Dawg came out to pick up the pace. They rocked The Monk with their progressive style. Their drummer knows what he's doing and you can easily see that the guitarist's and bassist's influences range from Hendrix to Hemmett and from Clapton to Claypool. Fans of Nirvana and the Seattle scene in general will love Two Headed Dawg.

Another show I saw was on which the local hard-core band All Tore Up got to play. They opened for Lunachicks at Jacob's Run and blew me away. This band is a powerhouse in the tradition of old C.O.C., Black Flag, and other New York hard-core skate bands. Their songs are a stonhouse of energy and come out with precise execution. They'll definitely leave you begging you for more.

The moral of this story is "support your local musicians!" The shows are always cheap so anyone can afford to go. And when possible, buy tapes and t-shirts because that will allow them to keep doing what they are doing: ENTERTAINING US!

a police jeep to headquarters. We got to fill out reports and hang out with the local police officers in an old hotel style building. Interesting.

The "real" culture shock came Thursday when we all boarded a chartered bus for Negrille, Jamaica. This was a great trip because of the seven mile stretches of white sandy beaches (which Montego Bay didn't really have), the clear water, the Spring Break 1993 games and activities, and the wet t-shirt contests. We also visited Rick's Cafe, which is famous for the cliff diving (as seen in one of the recent VISA commercials) and American style meals. It is ironic to note that Rick's Cafe does not accept credit cards, not even VISA, so bring plenty of cash. I was able to get an imported Miller Lite at Rick's. This was a real treat because the only brews available in the country were Red Stripe, which was Jamaica's version of Magnum Malt Liquor, and Heinekken, which is made in Jamaica as well. The Lite tasted like water because all the beers made in Jamaica have such a higher alcohol content than American brands and by this time, unfortunately, I was very used to the Red Stripe beer.

After the beautiful, romantic sunset that many people only dream about, we headed back to Montego Bay. On the way back, the bus encountered several trigger happy soldiers carrying huge machine guns and driving tanks. It seemed that the opposition to the current Jamaican government was having a rally and the road was closed to prevent unnecessary deaths. Pleasant thought, isn't it? Our bus detoured up a side road and caused a police jeep to fall in a ditch. Several UNCW students aided the police officer by lifting the jeep out of the ditch and as soon as the problem was resolved, someone started an "U.S.A." chant. Not a good decision. After all, we were in the backwoods of Jamaica stuck in a bus. We had to get out of the bus so Jacob, the driver, could attempt a twenty-eight point turn. Jacob did some incredible maneuvering and after a hour, we passed by the rally. Over a thousand citizens showed up for the event and all eyes were focused on the Americans in the tour bus. Scary event.

On Friday, we went on a four hour booze cruise in which we could drink, smoke, and dance as much as we pleased. I went snorkeling for the first time and saw purple fish, green fish, neon fish, sea cucumbers, and coral. All the pretty things blew my little mind. The time passed REAL quick, with the help of rum punch, and we headed back to the beach to lay out and eventually go shopping.

Saturday we packed all of our belongings and prepared for the flight home. Of course, the flight was delayed three hours, and we spent close to six hours in a third world airport. Just like the rest of the country, a bar was available to ease the wait.

After arriving back in Charlotte, it took an additional hour to check through customs and have our bags searched.

My eight o'clock class on Monday morning came very quick. I had a blast on the trip and would not trade the experience for anything. The trip was possible through Student Travel Services, Inc. which specializes in cheap, affordable vacations. No, I'm not advertising for them. It was just a great deal.

Going back to Jamaica is not in my horizon. I think next year I will choose something a little less annoying (the customs and people of Jamaica wear on your patience after a while) and closer to American soil and customs.

Bike forum discusses safety on UNCW

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

"Common sense" was the consensus of the forum held Monday night in the University Center Ballroom.

Many bicyclists feel they are receiving all the blame for problems and aren't being given a solution to accommodate them.

Bikes are at risk on the street and pedestrians often don't look for them when walking.

Bicyclist T. J. Miller said most complaints from pedestrians and drivers could be averted if the bicyclists would follow simple rules and use common sense.

"If riders would ride at a speed comparable to that of a jogger, there would be time for both parties to react," Miller said.

There is no one intersection on campus that is a problem. Accidents happen all over campus.

Dr. Kathleen Jewell, director of the Student Health and Wellness Center, also added "there is no trend to who is at fault."

David Lynch, a student and bike rider, suggested that parts of sidewalks should be designated as bike paths. John Geddie, director of safety, said that was tried a few years ago and was basically ignored.

Crosswalks were a major topic of discussion. Chief Billy Dawson, UNCW Police, addressed the issue. He said a bicyclist has the right-of-way at a crosswalk only if the rider has dismounted the bike and walks it across.

That is in accordance with state law. A simple campus policy cannot be passed because of liability.

"If (a policy for campus) doesn't follow state law, fault cannot be found," said Chief Dawson. "It must follow state law."

As part of the forum, bicycle helmets were given away as door prizes. The money for the helmets was donated by the New Hanover Regional Medical Center. Eight helmets were given away at the forum.

Deborah Haywood, coordinator of the forum and assistant director for the Center for Health Promotion, says there are many more helmets remaining. Anyone interested in purchasing a $40 Rhode Gear helmet for $8 should go by her office in Westside Hall.

Brother Dominique Catta

Brother Dominique Catta is a Benedictine monk who has served at the Monastery of Keur Moussa, Senegal, for 30 years. He has worked with monks at the monastery, including several who are Senegalese, in creating religious music which integrates African values and musical tradition with the rich Christian heritage of old Europe.

For example, Brother Catta has adapted Catholic rituals, such as the Ordinary of the Mass, to include hymns and prayers that he composed to be played on the kora (the African harp, which he is playing above) and the tamtam (a form of gong).

Through Brother Catta's use of these familiar African instruments, the liturgy of Christianity became meaningful in a Muslim country, and Brother Catta achieved his goal of creating something that both cultures could understand and enjoy.

Robert Muller

Robert Muller, the "philosopher of the United Nations," has spent his career advocating a peaceful world without borders. After joining the French Resistance during World War II, Mr. Muller returned to his homeland of Alsace-Lorraine, a European region on the German and French border, and devoted his life to peace.

He won a United Nations essay contest on world government and later joined the United Nations Secretariat. In Mr. Muller's 38 years of service at the United Nations, he rose to the rank of Assistant Secretary-General, helped coordinate the work of several United Nations agencies, launched several world conferences, and delivered hundreds of speeches on world peace.

Mr. Muller, also known as the father of global education, has written many books that have been published in many different languages. Now in active retirement, he works for the United Nations offices in New York and Geneva, Switzerland, and is the Chancellor Emeritus of the UN University for Peace in Costa Rica.

Sir John Wilson

Sir John Wilson, blinded at the age of 12 in a school chemistry accident, has been instrumental in the founding of several world agencies for the prevention of avoidable blindness and other disabilities. As a staff member of the Royal National Institute for the Blind, he conducted research that took him on journeys throughout the world.

Sir John and his wife Jean traveled throughout Africa, Asia, Europe, and the Americas to establish organizations for the blind and to help in blindness prevention. On a journey to West Africa, they discovered entire villages stricken with ocular onchocerciasis, a type of blindness that they termed "river blindness." In addition, they created a river blindness control program in West Africa and helped to establish cataract surgeries in India.

Through his work with the Royal National Institute for the Blind in London and the United Nations' sanctioned organization, IMPACT, an organization for people with preventable injuries, Sir John has made an indelible mark on society.

The Albert Schweitzer International Prizes will be awarded tonight in Kenan Auditorium. There will be a public reception afterward in Wagoner Hall. The prizes are awarded every four years at UNCW by the North Carolina Educational, Historical, and Scientific Foundation, Inc. The prizes are awarded to individuals worldwide who reflect Dr. Schweitzer's philosophy of "reverence for life."

The prizes recognize excellence in medicine, music, and the humanities, the three areas in which Schweitzer excelled. The award winners are chosen by a secret committee and are each given $7,500 and a bronze medal. The prizes are the only kind in the world, and the only international prizes given in North Carolina.

Purpose of the Prizes

The purpose of the prizes is three-fold. First, to honor and keep alive the memory of Dr. Albert Schweitzer.

Second, to honor men and women around the world who reflect Dr. Schweitzer's philosophy of life and who excel in the fields of music, medicine, and the humanities.

Third, to bring great men and women to UNCW, so that students from UNCW, other universities, colleges, and high schools may personally meet great models to live by.

Albert Schweitzer

Albert Schweitzer was born in 1875 in Alsace, a European region that borders present-day Germany and France, the eldest son of a Lutheran pastor. He studied extensively, earning doctorates in philosophy, theology, and medicine. He also excelled greatly in music.

After his marriage to Helene Bresslau, the two went to Africa to establish a hospital on the banks of the Ogowe River. During World War I, the Schweitzers were interned in Gabon by the French as enemy aliens (Germans) and later sent to prison in France.

In 1924, Schweitzer returned to Africa to finish the work he started. Schweitzer's work includes many publications in the areas of music, medicine, and the humanities that displayed his "reverence for life."

Schweitzer received a Nobel Peace Prize in 1952 and used the funds from the award to establish a leper village where he worked and lived until his death in 1965.

THE Gutter

BY WAYNE WILLIAMS
Sports Editor

Well, this is it the final Gutter from yours truly. It is now time for this nonsensical, fact bumbling, non prize winning pseudojournalist to go from Editor to assistant and let some new blood take the helm of glory, place it on their head and say the three immortal words given to me by the Editor-in-Chief himself, Spellcheck, Spellcheck, Spellcheck!!!

It has been a long road in the year of UNCW sports, and I thank the Seahawk for letting a student that did not have a week before school started to take this often tiresome position, but I did it and do not regret doing it. Stop your crying, I know that it is going to be tough; this separation and all, but I will still be here. By gosh UNCW get a hold of yourself.

Like every sporting career must come to an end, so does that of a destitute Sports Editor in desperate need of future employment, so with this as my introduction to this week's installment to my never ending searchbox begging for a football team at UNCW, me (Guterman) and my trusty sidekick and Gutter confidant Mark Mathews will present to you, Our version of an Atlantic Coast Conference First Team All America list that you won't see in the USA Today, ESPN or any reputable sources that you have grown to trust.

Our first team has to deal with the toughest defenders in the ACC. Why, you ask, because of their mere presence on the court directly changes the outcome of play. Not necessarily because of their great skill but merely because their physical appearance has struck horror in the mere souls of the opposition and limits the vision of offensive powerhouses.

We present to you, the fans, the 1993 ACC ALL UGLY TEAM. At guards we have Duke's Bobby. These two collected more votes than almost any other players in the running.

This would explain Hurley's assists record, players are just merely running away from him in sheer terror.

This also explains why Rodi is always open, who wants to guard cousin it, really.

At the forward positions we have selected Erik Meek from Duke and Evers Burns from Maryland. These two embody the spirit and the letter of what Mark and I had in mind when we sat down to look at the tapes for our selection committee.

And at the center spot, we have selected Duke's Cherokee Parks as the ugliest center in the ACC.

We looked at tons of video during the season and the letters came pouring in when the word got out of our secret mission. Thank you for your help UNCW but Walt Williams no longer plays in the ACC.

One day these fine players may be ugly enough to make it to the ACC Ugly Hall Of Fame, whose induction ceremony has been rated R, for its graphic, unsettling moments when the recipients start to tear up and make faces that just simply do not become them.

To NIT or not to NIT UNCW speaks

BY WAYNE WILLIAMS
Sports Editor

Last Sunday millions of sports fans sat in front of their televisions to see just who would make it into the NCAA tournament. It was no surprise that UNCW was not among the sixty four teams selected. Not as popular as the NCAA Tournament is the National Invitational Tournament, which is held all across the country simultaneously, and has its own final four and champion.

32 teams are selected each year to partake in this tournament. In the Colonial Athletic Association, James Madison and Old Dominion were selected to its pool of teams.

The Seahawk wonders what UNCW students thought about UNCW's chances to get a bid were.

So here is the question, does UNCW qualify for a chance to play in the NIT? The following will be a look at some of the interesting thoughtful responses that were received.

"I think that they should of won the tournament to get a bid (NCAA), it is there to narrow out the competition. It gives an underdog a chance to further its season, like ECU with a 13 and 16 record, they had a fighting chance," said Janice Bates. We would have to take her statement to say no UNCW does not deserve a chance to play in the NIT.

Others like Ralph Morrison thought that, "they deserve to go to the NIT, because their record proves that they can compete with NIT-type teams."

Todd McDonald was mixed on the subject, "I would like to see the team go, yes, but I feel we lost too many games on the way to too many teams that we should of beaten for me to honestly say that they deserve such a bid. If they would of beaten ECU and was 18-11 things may be different. But losses to the George Masons and The Appalachians hinder consideration."

Each one of the students showed exuberance in this seasons record, and made comments supporting the turn-around of the UNCW program.

Rugby team takes third

By Matthew Potter
Rugby Correspondent

During this past "Superstorm" weekend, the UNCW Rugby Club traveled to Savannah, Georgia, for the annual St. Patrick's Day Rugby Tournament. The team, feeling confident after their win over Duke three weeks previously were hoping to make an impression at this tournament.

The first opponent that the Seahawks were to face was a New York team that traveled to play in some pretty adverse weather conditions. UNCW started the first half against Plattsburg with the wind at their backs they soon accumulated a 13-0 lead in the first half.

This was also the final score of the game with UNCW not allowing the Platts to score, was also held scoreless in the second half. Both teams ineffectiveness could largely be traced to the weather conditions.

The second game for the Seahawks was against Middle Tennessee State, who, in the snow and wind proved to be too strong an opponent for the Seahawks. The first half ended with UNCW trailing 13-0. Despite holding Middle Tennessee State scoreless in the first half, the Seahawks only mustered 3 second half points, making the final score 13-3. The team can take some consolation in the fact that Middle Tennessee State went on to win the tournament.

Next up for the Seahawks was Penn State, which did not show up to the schedule game and the Seahawks won by default.

The Seahawk record was good enough for the team to place third in the tournament.

The next game will be at home March 20 on Brooks Field at 1:00 P.M..

The rugby team (in the multi-colored jerseys), seen here defeating Duke University, will be in action Saturday at 1 p.m. at Brooks Field.

UNCW Men's Ultimate finished two competitions that has tested the strength of the team. In Virginia the Sea-men went 5-0 and in a California meet the team took second place.

The Virginia meet pitted UNCW against Haverford, UVA- Alumni, Navy, Carnegie Mellon, and ECU. All of these teams fell to the Seahawks in very adverse conditions.

The players had to play the games in 2 1/2 inches of snow, and players feet were frozen to the point that players couldn't feel their toes.

UNCW looked out west over spring break to test the strength of their team and judge how they look as they head to nationals.

After wrapping up a west coast trip, the UNCW Sea-men are poised to make a strong bid for the collegiate national championships. The Sea-men placed second at the Stanford Invitational Tournament March 6 and 7. The Stanford Invitational was dubbed "The Mini Nationals," since it incorporated teams from Nationals over the past 3 years. Three teams (2 of the top 4) from the 1992 Nationals were present as well as a team from Madison Wisconsin.

The Sea-men, who were short-handed and riddled with injuries drove all the way to the final game against Stanford University a rematch of 1992. Along the way, the Sea-men lost two games. One lost was to the University of Santa Cruz 10-9 and Madison-Wisconsin (who they would face in the semis) 13-5.

When Sunday broke the Sea-men recharged and refueled, defeating the University of California Davis 15-12 and Madison-Wisconsin 17-12 to face Stanford University.

In the final game the injuries and fatigue took their toll against the Sea-men as they fell to Stanford 12-8 in a capped game.

The fourth annual collegiate eastern ultimate frisbee championship will be held on the UNCW campus at Brooks Field March 27 and 28. Events start each day at 9 A.M.

March Madness kicks into gear

BY MARK MATTHEWS
Staff Writer

Editor in Chief Jim Clark chose to analyze the Midwest region. He feels that BYU, with an upset win over Kansas, will comprise this region's part of the Sweet Sixteen, along with Indiana, Duke and Louisville.

Jim's final words on this region are, "I don't expect Indiana to win this region because of the injury to Allen Henderson. Duke is going to be tough, but I've got a feeling Louisville is going to be hot."

Walt Doyle, UNCW senior and future coach of the New York Giants (he's still waiting for his phone call) turned his attention to basketball as he gave us his opinions on the outcome of the south-east region.

Walt went against the grain more than the rest of the contributors picking Kentucky, Wake Forest, Tulane and Memphis State to go to the Sweet Sixteen, with Kentucky going on to the final four.

His darkhorse pick is the Purple Aces of Evansville which he justifies by stating, "I'm not scared to pick the fourteenth seed over the third seed."

Marcus Thompson, basketball handicapper extraordinaire, gives his insight as to the West region. Marcus feels favorite Michigan, will advance along with Arizona, Vanderbilt, Iowa State, New Mexico, Georgia Tech, Illinois, and Temple.

Who to watch out for? "Michigan, of course, is a very strong team and Webber should carry them far. Georgia Tech will meet Michigan in the sweet sixteen and will give them a scare, and possibly an upset."

Jeff Jackson, UNCW senior, gave us his thoughts as to who will advance in the first round of the Midwest region. Jeff sees favorites Indiana, Duke and Kansas easily advancing, as well as Oklahoma State, Louisville, California, B.Y.U., and Xavier.

His overall thoughts on the region, "Watch out for Louisville's superior all-around athletes and their home court advantage until they play Indiana. They are the only team in the upper half of the Midwest bracket to match Indiana in both size and coaching. These factors make them a sleeper."

The southeast region is this year's NCAA tournament is without question the Midwest. Stacked with perennial powerhouses such as Indiana and Kansas, as well as the defending national champion Duke (pronounced dooook) Blue Devils, this region promises to be a difficult route to take on the road to the final four.

Look for tournament experienced Indiana, Louisville, Duke and Kansas to be the last four four with these teams.

So who's going to be this region's representative in the final four? As much as I hate to admit it, look for the Blue Devils to make another cameo appearance. Duke's pressure defense should to some point contain All-American Calbert Cheaney and shooting guard Damon Bailey. Look for Duke to utilize Bobby Hurley's quickness and penetration skills against Indiana's bigger, slower guards to create some easy baskets.

How will they fare....

Approximately 25,000 pine cones, downed by last weekend's "Storm of the Century" spell out the names of the newest team on campus. Wachovia National Bank has pledged $250,000 to UNCW over the next five years.

Part of $250,000 grant UNCW receives $50,000 from Wachovia National Bank

UNCW NEWS

Dr. James R. Leutze, chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, today announced a corporate gift of $250,000 from Wachovia Bank to establish the Wachovia Initiatives in Excellence Fund. Presenting the initial check for $50,000 to the university were James C. Cherry, Wachovia's Wilmington area executive, and Will B. Spence, Wachovia regional executive.

To visually illustrate the size of just half of the initial check, approximately 25,000 pine cones spelled out UNCW and Wachovia on the lawn in front of Hoggard Hall. The UNCW Ambassadors, a student service organization that assists in special events and public relation activities, gathered the pine cones from the millions showered on campus during the "Storm of the Century" March 13 and 14.

This major contribution to UNCW's five-year, $15 million Capital Campaign brings the total pledged and contributed to date to $5.9 million. Wachovia's pledge will be $50,000 a year for five years.

At a press conference announcing the gift, Leutze explained that this fund has been set up in such a way that the unrestricted endowment will grow quickly over time. Once the amount reached near the quarter-million dollar level, the chancellor will begin spending some of the earnings for new programs and activities.

"The Wachovia Initiatives in Excellence Fund will assist UNCW in developing new programs to support our commitment to excellence in teaching, research, artistic achievement and service to local global communities," Leutze said. "At this time, I anticipate that every three to five years, earnings from the Wachovia endowment will supply funds for a new initiative."

The gift has also been set up in such a way that up to 10 percent of the earnings may be used every year to fund the Loyalty Fund which meets annual needs of the university such as scholarships, lectures and other activities.

In presenting the check, Wachovia area executive James C. Cherry described the gift as an endowment that will grow in perpetuity to fund initiative in education. "If at any time, this is the time when new initiatives in education are needed," Cherry said. "Wachovia is making this pledge because we have so much confidence in and high regard for the University of North Carolina at Wilmington for what it is accomplishing now and for what it promises to accomplish."

On behalf of the university, Leutze expressed his thanks for the unusually large gift. "We especially appreciate Wachovia's leadership as an early contributor to the campaign. This continues a long and valuable relationship between UNCW and Wachovia."

Among Wachovia's prior gifts was a $100,000 to the Cameron School of Business Administration in 1983 to endow the Wachovia Fund for Excellence.

Wachovia Bank of North Carolina is a statewide banking institution headquartered in Winston-Salem with 222 branches in 97 cities. Since the late 19th century, the bank has been a leader in meeting the financial need and public interests of communities throughout the state.

Record Voter Turnout

Nix, Carney to lead SGA

BY HOLLY PRICE
News Editor

The Student Government Association elections concluded last Wednesday with the largest voter turnout in The University of North Carolina at Wilmington's history with 1058 students participating.

Election Board Chair, Mary Taylor attributes accessible polling locations and widespread campaigning by candidates to be the reason for the turnout.

Duane (Ziggy) Nix was victorious over Lee Person for Student Body president. Nix received 56% of the vote with 565 votes, with Person only having 452.

Nix was not surprised with the high voter turnout.

"They've been planning this election since October," said Nix.

He also stated that the food and Frisbees at the polls were an enticement to students.

"They got something for voting," said Nix.

Nix has many aspirations for his new administration. Projects he hopes to accomplish are: increased availability of the media on campus, expansion of UNCW's recycling program to include glass, paper, and plastic, and he would like to see the Little Seahawk program get underway in full force. The Little Seahawk program is a project begun by SGA to help freshmen in their adjustment to college.

Nix is a member of Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and is also a third year UNCW orientation leader.

SGA Pres. Ziggy Nix

SGA VP Lyn Carney

Nix's new administration will include Lyn Carney as Student Body Vice President. She was victorious over Jeff Gurkin in a 51% win. Carney had 503 votes, with Gurkin having 405 votes.

Carney was pleased with the voter turnout.

"We had a major publicity campaign this year to get as many eligible students involved. Their participation is of vital importance," said Carney.

The executive board will also include Kevin Smith as attorney general and Phil Feiner as student services coordinator.

Nix's administration will also include: Ashley Wallace as senior class president, Eve Williams as senior class vice president, Renee Elliot and Jonathon Rowell as senior class senators.

The junior class will be led by Roger Hyman as Class president and Tonya Whitehead as vice president.

Eight representatives at large were also elected. Representatives at large are John Farmer, Amy Wolfe, Vern Grainger, Phil Berger, Robyn Marshall, Sam Cutrell, Bryan Gibson, Van Davenport, and Craig Hudson.

The inauguration of all new members of SGA will be Monday night at 6:15 p.m. in the Hawks Nest.

Controversy During Pledge Show

BY JULIE PODLASEK
Staff Writer

Last Tuesday night, March 23, at the Greek Pledge Show, Sigma Nu's pledge class was disqualified for obscene behavior during their part of the talent show.

The pledges violated rule number three of the contest which read, "No obscene, vulgar, or distasteful acts will be tolerated. This will include, but not be limited to, the throwing of condoms, racist behaviors, use of blackface, and use of obscenities."

After they performed, Rich Whitlow, President of the Interfraternity Council, apologized on behalf of the organization. One viewer who wishes to remain anonymous stated, "I thought it was funny the first few minutes, but then it became very vulgar, and seemed to get worse as it continued on. They should have taken into consideration that there were kids as well as parents in the audience."

Onlooker Heather Butler shared her viewpoint about the show. "I felt like they got a little too carried away with their actions, but obviously they spent a lot of time on it, since the dancers were very well choreographed. I don't think it was purposely vulgar."

Chad Davenport, President of Sigma Nu, responded in their defense. "It's a pledge talent show so we let the pledges do it on their own. We kind of had an idea of what they were doing, but we didn't know what it was specifically."

The Fraternity is very apologetic about the show. "We are very sorry. We understand people's concerns and we didn't mean to offend anyone, although we feel it has been blown way out of proportion," replied Davenport. One thing they were careful to point out was the fact that the very same Madonna video, Truth or Dare, that they modeled their show after, was shown here on campus in the ballroom, open to the public.

"All we were doing was making fun of someone like her," stated Davenport.

Letters of apology have been written to all the sororities as well as to the President of IFC, who sponsored the show, and the Greek Advisor, Bob Smith. Their pledges on their own free will also wrote separate letters apologizing for their actions.

Davenport asks that people not judge their whole Fraternity by this one mistake that they've made. "They wouldn't have done it if they knew people would get so angry about it. But we are very sorry and did not mean to offend anyone."

Most People Pray, Even Atheist

I recently ran across an old issue of Newsweek magazine. The cover story was "Talking to God: An Intimate Look at the Way We Pray." The article was based on some surveys about the prayer habit of Americans, both believers and non-believers. What the pollsters discovered is that most people pray, including atheists! That is, most people, believers and non-believers, turn to a higher power at various moments in their lives.

I figured that if some comments can appear in Newsweek, then I might even dare to reflect on prayer in a similarly non-religious publication like The Seahawk.

In the evolutionary process of human kind, there is an emerging trend that I find incredibly exciting. Where we have focused on the differences between religious and between denominations for centuries in an apparent effort to establish which one is Truth, there now appears to be a growing willingness to look at other religions and denominations with a view of discovering what is we have in common rather than what it is that divides us. Having seen so much anger, hatred, feelings of superiority and even violence having their origins in the religious focus on differences, the trend toward discovering our commonality is something devoutly to be desired and encouraged.

Part of that commonality is that everyone prays! Almost everyone in our world has some sense that there is a higher power to which we have access through prayer, even non-believers. However our beliefs may differ, I find it wonderfully affirming to be aware that most people have this experience of a higher power as an ongoing part of their lives. Instead of beginning conversations about religion with questions like, "Are you saved?" or "What do you believe about God?" what if we started such conversations with the question, "What is that experience like for you and how does it impact on your life?" Such an avenue of conversation would identify an incredible amount of common ground and it is from such common ground that we can explore our differences without nearly so much antagonism. And if we are interested in helping people grow in faith, we would do well to begin with our experience of God rather than our beliefs about God for it is there that the real power of our religious life lies. Theology is important, to be sure, but theology emerges from experience, and it is in the experience of a higher power that we find we stand on common ground.

Pursuing a different train of thought, the Newsweek article pointed also to the increasing value of prayer that comes to people who discover the difference between verbal prayer and meditation. When we think of meditation, we often associate that experience with Eastern Religions but meditation has a long, noble and powerful history in very dimension of Christendom and, as a matter of fact, in every religion.

Most of us have been taught that prayer means to forms words with our mouths or our minds and spirit right back to the God who is somehow totally other from us, the transcendent power of creation. Meditation, in all its varieties, is the development of a connection with that same power whom we discover living at the very core of our being. Meditation centers around words like silence, solitude, reflection and centering. It is a process that becomes more common to us as we grow older but is available at any age to help a person root themselves in the nourishment of the cosmic creative force that has birthed us and will both sustain and guide us as long as we remain open.

If you have ever been in love, you know well the experience when in your relationship you move past the activities of dating and find yourself, for example, walking on the beach hand in hand, silent, incredibly aware of the profound connection between the two of you. Such awareness comes in our spiritual life through meditation and it has the same force for grounding us in a profound relationship with a power beyond us.

The experience of God through prayer and meditation is the deepest part each day of my life. I hope it is for as well.

Letters come in all shapes and wordings

Recently, people have been submitting more letters and opinions to The Seahawk, which is good, but are not in the proper format. The proper format is in the masthead at the top of this page. It states, "The Seahawk welcomes letters to the editor. These should be typed and include the author's name, address, phone number, and campus affiliation (if any). Unsigned letters will not be published."

That statement doesn't leave much room for question. Handwritten notes on scrap paper full of profane language regarding the Student Government Association or letters written on the back of a poster advertising your philosophy telling us what is and isn't news simply won't be considered for publication.

The reason The Seahawk needs names, numbers, and campus affiliation is so we can verify, clarify and/or follow-up on the information in the letter. If the author would like to remain anonymous, he needs to specify that in the letter, but still must sign the letter and include the rest of the information asked for.

A recent letter to the editor described an incident that supposedly occurred at a local night spot. The author's name was not in the student phone book and left no means to contact her. In following up to see if the incident she describes was true, the owner of the club said it wasn't. Now, it's one person's word against another. The Seahawk is not a forum for personal grudges.

The most effective letters to the editor are short, to the point, and signed. An anonymous letter serves little purpose. It presents an idea, but there is no one to associate with it. By making a stand on an issue and putting your name on it, you are showing that you care and are willing to discuss the issue.

The Seahawk welcomes all letters, but we must have the information asked for to ensure quality and standards. Though creative ways of approaching us are entertaining, we are not at liberty to forego our responsibilities as a newspaper.

Fraternity Causes Controversy

Tuesday night the Interfraternity Council hosted its spring pledge tip sync in Kenan Auditorium. The crowd, including Head Basketball Coach Kevin Eastman and his young son, received a little more than they had bargained for from Sigma Nu pledges.

Sigma Nu's pledges performed, if that's what you want to call it, a rendition of Madonna's video for the song, "Like a Virgin." And that's the nicest thing to say about what they did.

They gyrated, felt themselves and simulated sexual intercourse. Madonna has probably done all of these things, but this wasn't Madonna nor was it MTV. MTV is something one chooses to watch by flipping a channel. One can flip the channel if something becomes offensive. The Sigma Nus were something the audience was forced to watch.

People covered their eyes. People put their heads down. And there were a few "Oh my Gods" for good measure.

It is safe to say that the Sigma Nu pledges embarrassed some members of the audience as well as offending them. They also embarrassed themselves and IFC, enough so that Rich Whitlow, IFC president, came before the crowd and apologized on behalf of the entire IFC. He also announced that Sigma Nu had been disqualified. Justly so.

In the defense of the rest of the Sigma Nu brothers; they have made it clear they knew not what their pledges were up to.

Every time that a Greek organization does something publicly, they are representing the system as a whole as well as their individual fraternity or sorority. In disgracing themselves the Sigma Nu pledges cast a shadow on the Greek system as a whole at UNCW.

Computer Help

Editor: I'd like to take this opportunity to thank the two gentlemen, Dyl and Chuck, who both helped me on a computer project earlier this week. Without their assistance, I'd probably still be sitting there in front of that computer screen.

Lately a lot of Cameron School of Business students have been upset with the recent removal of our computer lab, myself included. With only one lab available to all of the business students, one could wait over an hour for a terminal, and even then you're not promised a printer. And trekking all the way over to Randall Library or Schwartz to print out a balance sheet or Brandman's results tends to get annoying. But through Dyl and Chuck, I have renewed my confidence in the computer lab system. Both were very helpful, patient, and knowledgeable. Not only did they take the time to assist me, but they explained things so that next time I could do it on my own.

Again, Dyl and Chuck, thank you.

Ticket System Needs Revision

Editor: Thanks to the hard work and dedication of the Seahawk's, attending basketball in a manner more understandable by UNCW students.

One suggestion is that a Baked Alaska dessert could demonstrate properties of insulation. Hot dogs could easily be used in an electrical circuit to show how resistance works, and more importantly how it cooks a hot dog. All told, I think the idea is an excellent way to make the mind and stomach interact in an educational sort of way. And besides, it would make my next physics test a lot easier to swallow.

Moocoooving on...to this week's "Campus Cop Moment." I was going to give them the week off but I've received reports of their being rude to a student organization member who tried to sell them a box of Krispy Kreme donuts during a recent fund-raiser. Remember guys, it only takes one piece of molded bread to spoil the entire loaf. Anyhow, what I was going to say about the rental cops this week relates to a new "motorist speed reduction device" they have been using recently. Perhaps you were as surprised as I was carening (at warp speed) across campus the other day only to see, in big bright letter "YOUR SPEED IS _____" (don't worry about the numbers; you should get the picture). Well I have an idea to counteract this tactic. Wouldn't it be nice if we had a big screen to aim right back at them saying "YOUR WEIGHT IS ____". I'll probably get hate mail for that one, but that's the price one sometimes has to pay in the world of NoBull Prize winning journalism.

More local news out of Carolina Beach this week. Town officials last week adopted an ordinance "Human male genitals in a discernible turgid state, even if completely and opaquely covered." Determined though wearers have resolved to fight back saying "Well, if they don't like our bathing suits, then we'll be glad to take them off." Go figure.

Congratulations this week go to recent winners in the SGA Elections. Special congratulations go to my fraternal friends Ziggy Nix (SGA President), Phil Feiner (SGA Service Coordinator), and Chris Sudduith (Sophomore President). I have personally congratulated them and warned them that they are now subject to the high standards they must perspire to in order to stay away from the "Shoes Off" section of my column. Good luck fellas!!!

Speaking of the SHOES OFF award, this week's goes to UNCW student Travis Brandon Shepard. Now Mr. Shepard has not done anything to me personally that would warrant his receiving such dishonor, but semi-coherent reader Phil Sasser has informed me that Travis wanted to see his name in the paper. So, in granting his earnest desire, I say "Shoes Off" to Travis.

Hats Off this week go to Greyhound Bus Lines, officials bus line of the Dook University Blue Devils. Word is that Greyhound is the only one that will give refunds for previously purchased tickets to New Orleans. Besides, aren't you glad that college basketball is rid of Bobby Hurley, the second snottiest (don't forget Laettner) player in history? HATS OFF to Greyhound Bus Lines, offering non-stop service to Durham, NC.

Well friends, that about wraps it up for this week. As usual, your letters, cards and canned foods are always welcomed. Address them to me, in care of The Seahawk.

Until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Letters To The Editor

Editor: I would like to take this opportunity to recognize a special group of individuals. "STAR" (Student Team Against Rape), is the most hard working and dedicated group of individuals I have ever been associated with.

Their belief in what they are doing is solid. Over the past several months, I have watched this organization take an idea ("Take Back the Night" march and rally) and turn it into a very successful community event. They put forth so much energy and enthusiasm that I knew the event would be a success. To watch it all come together, was truly a rewarding experience. They are to be commended for a job WELL DONE. It is truly an honor to be associated with this fine organization. Once again, congratulations on your success.

Bicyclist Beware

Editor: The question is, "In general, do you feel that students at UNCW observe the rules of bicycle safety?" Sure, students observe the rules of bicycle safety. What biker owner would not want their bike to be safe? However, they are juvenile delinquents as far as pedestrian safety is practiced. Quite a few times I have come very close to becoming a hood ornament on a set of handlebars.

Sidewalks are made primarily and first of all for pedestrian use, not skateboards, or bicycles, or tricycles, or wagons, or kiddie cars. Biker riders should be required to park their bikes in racks provided at the edge of campus. Car drivers cannot drive their vehicles onto the grounds proper. How come bicycle riders are the privileged? (After paying $30.00 for a "sometimes" spacesafe parking permit, it is the motorized vehicle owner who should be allowed to park at the building door.)

Only feet should pound the sacred ground of UNCW's thinking factory.

Peggy Spencer
Education major

games at Trask Coliseum is becoming more popular each year. Much of the community came out to support us this season and to be a part of the spirited crowd cheering louder with each basket that it made. The number of students coming out to show their support is also growing. I think it's wonderful and I am one of the first to join everyone in supporting my team. What I didn't like was the athletic department's system of distributing tickets. It was an inconvenience to students in many ways.

While picking up their free tickets, students were only allowed to purchase one other ticket for a guest. The benefit of getting both the student ticket and the purchased guest ticket at the same time was that the seats would be side by side, thereby enabling the students to sit with their guests. The problem with this is that usually students wish to bring more than one guest to a game. According to Mr. Greg Dalton, assistant athletic director, in order to have gotten tickets for two or more seats next to each other, students had to have purchased their tickets at the normal $6.00 rate. The athletic department should have been happy enough from selling the tickets to students' friends not to have charged the students.

Mr. Dalton is quoted as saying (The Seahawk, Feb. 4), "At big schools, kids camp out to get tickets" and that we, as students, are lucky to get tickets at all. Many students attending this university are here because they did not wish to deal with the chaos of larger universities or "big schools" as Mr. Dalton put it. Duke university had students camping outside in a tent village for a total of 25 days to wait for tickets to a basketball game. The system definitely needs to be reformed if students are forced to that level in order to support their team. Camping out for a month is certain to interfere with the students' academic life, which is what a university's number one priority should be.

I must agree that our problem has not yet reached that level of intensity but with student and community support for the Seahawks growing rapidly it won't be long before the situation worsens. Each student should have the privilege of receiving a free ticket for themselves no matter when they get it or where they wish to sit. The current system needs to be revised.

Renovated Bookstore To Open Soon

BY JOHN BRYAN
Staff Writer

The renovation of the UNCW Bookstore is nearing completion.

Mr. Arnold Siko, the bookstore manager, says that the end of May is the most likely period that the renovated Burney Student Support Center will be ready to once again, house the bookstore.

Construction delays have pushed back the completion days 2 weeks as of the writing of this article. Although the building may be ready to be occupied at the end of May, Mr. Siko says that the bookstore will continue to operate out of the two trailers set up in the parking lot outside of the Support Center for Summer Session I.

This is because there will not be enough time to move and set up shop before the summer session begins. Smaller enrollments during the summer sessions shouldn't pose that much of a problem for the bookstore, Mr. Siko said.

The primary goal of the renovated bookstore will be to offer better service according to the manager. A "point of sale" system will be implemented, that is, scanners like those now used in the supermarkets will read the price of the item from a bar code affixed to the item.

Mr. Siko says that this should shorten the line and the time spent waiting in the lines. This will be especially helpful during the first couple of weeks of each semester when the lines are long with students buying books for their classes. There will also be an expanded trade books section. Before, these books only occupied one shelf. Also, the bookstore will offer a better product mix of non-book items.

With all of the new changes occurring, book prices won't be changing. Many students and some faculty members believe that book prices are too high.

"Book prices are set by the publisher," says Mr. Siko, "and the bookstore marks them up at a rate that covers freight and other handling charges."

A portion of the markup also goes toward operating expenses that allow the bookstore to remain solvent.

"The bookstore receives no state funding for its operation," said Mr. Siko, "many people are surprised to learn that."

He says that he can sympathize with students about the high costs of books.

"We make every effort to offer the lowest possible prices," he said.

He welcomes students to attend the Bookstore Advisory Committee coming up in April to learn more about the bookstore operation and to offer suggestions about how to make it better. Students are always welcome to these meetings. The committee is made up of faculty, students and staff. Ms. Lanita Hanson of Student Activities is the committee chair.

The Burney Student Support Center was originally built in 1985 especially for the bookstore. When asked why a renovation was required so soon, Mr. Siko stated that student enrollment was less than and the bookstore didn't need all the space. The bookstore shared the building with the Parking Office and The Student Health and Wellness Center.

The new bookstore will now occupy the whole building except for some offices which the communications department, faculty and Parking Offices use. Before the bookstore occupied the Burney Support Center, it was housed in a metal building that stood where the large planter outside of the building now stands. Prior to that, it was in Hinton James Hall along with the Student Union.

Earth Day Concert Slated For April 24

BY AMY PETROCELLI
Staff Writer

With the evolution of the earth, environmental awareness becomes increasingly more important. In hopes of raising environmental awareness among UNCW students and the Wilmington community, the Association for Campus Entertainment (ACE), and the Environmental Concerns Organization (ECO) have joined forces to plan the Earth Day Seaside Revival Concert to benefit the North Carolina Chapter of The Nature Conservancy.

The concert will be held on April 24 from 11-6 p.m. at Brook's Field, and will feature local bands Pandora's Lunchbox, Citizen X, Tunnel Vision, Wretched Sun, and Emily's Porch. In addition to music, the event will feature booths set up by campus and community organizations, door prizes, T-shirt sales, refreshments and other attractions.

"The purpose of this event, is two-fold," explained Brant

Vanboy, concert chairman for ACE. "We want to provide entertainment for students, as well as focus on an environmental issue," he said.

Funds raised from the event will benefit two specific projects that the Nature Conservancy is working on, explained ECO member Julie Clarke. These local projects are the acquisition of land for the Black River Conservancy, home of the oldest species of trees east of the Rocky Mountains; and the continuation of stewardship of the Green Swamp Conservancy, one of the largest of its kind.

Vanboy stated that he thought the choice to donate funds to such causes was a good one. "Our environment is an endangered species and we should treat it that way," he said.

The Earth Day Seaside Revival concert is actually a finale of week long events centered around Earth Day (Thursday, April 22). Throughout the week, ECO will have tables set up in the University Center and in the cafeteria, during which time they will pass out literature regarding environmental concerns. They will also be giving away plants in exchange for recyclable cans, and will be registering teams for the Campus Sweep that will take place on Thursday.

The Campus Sweep is an opportunity for teams to participate in a campus clean-up that will be set up like a treasure hunt. The three winning teams will receive gift certificates to local establishments. All participants of the event will receive a free pass to the concert on Saturday.

Also on Thursday will be a panel discussion in Bryan Auditorium from 3:30-5:30 p.m. The discussion, titled "How to Promote Environmental Stewardship in the Planning of the UNC-Wilmington Campus Development," will include panelists Dr. Joan Willey, chemistry professor, and biology professor Dr. Martin Posey.

Clarke stated that a student will be on the panel as well, to represent students' interests. Also present will be Earth Day Alliance representative Andy Wood.

"I think there is good potential for some really exciting discussion," said Clarke. "We should get some good provocative ideas going."

Clarke stated that ECO has been working hard to plan these events, but that the main project for both ECO and ACE this semester has been the planning of the Seaside Revival Concert.

Clarke is confident that by incorporating Earth Day into an exciting outdoor event, a broad audience will be reached. "We want to raise environmental awareness in a positive context rather than in a preachy context," Clarke said.

Vanboy emphasized that the fund-raiser would not be possible without the sponsorship of ACE, ECO, the Geology and Geography Clubs, Student Activities, SGA, The Seahawk, Waste Management of Wilmington, SURF 107, Signs of Success, McDonald's (McAnderson franchise) and Dominos.

Tickets for the event will be $5.00, or $4.00 with student ID. For more information call 395-3842.

Professor Published

BY ROBIN TISINGER
Staff Writer

UNCW's English professor, Dr. Richard Hill has been riddled with book signings and interviews since his latest suspense novel was published last November.

What Rough Beast? is the first in a series of four novels featuring the character, Private-eye Randall Gatsby Sierra. Detective "Gat" Sierra, martial arts expert and ex cop, searches across the U.S. for missing youth. But when an old high school friend is reported missing, Sierra finds himself on the path of a serial killer.

All 2,500 copies of the book have sold and Dr. Hill said he has received substantial royalties.

"I think a detective series might work," Dr. Hill said.

The next two "Gat" Sierra novels, one set in England and the other out West, are ready for publication, said Dr. Hill.

Not all of his writings are detective fiction, Dr. Hill said, but most include mysterious elements "beyond the ordinary."

For example, in his 1971 book, Ghost Story, the main character, seeking shelter from a hurricane, builds his identity around a vacant house.

Separate from his detective series, Dr. Hill said his book about a high school kid who plays with Jazz musicians during the 1950's will be published soon.

A copy of What Rough Beast? is available at Randall Library. Dr. Hill's writing has also appeared in Esquire, Omni, Playboy and Rolling Stone magazines.

Dean Bob Smith

The Man Behind The Title

BY JULIE PODLASEK
Staff Writer

Through all of my many interactions with the Assistant Dean of Students, Robert Smith, who is more commonly known to Greek students as "Bob," I have found that he is a very different person than he appears to be.

I recently had the opportunity to conduct an interview with Bob to find out what "the man behind the title" is all about.

Raised in Pittsburgh, Bob sought his education at Indiana University of Pennsylvania. There he received his Bachelor of Arts Degree and his Masters. To further his education, he then attended Indiana University, Bloomington, where he received his Master of Science.

At IUP, he was an active member of Phi Kappa Theta Fraternity and continues to be an active alumnus. After graduating, he served as Convention Dean and Convention Chair at Phi Kappa Theta's national headquarters, where he then elected to the Board of Trustees of his Fraternity in 1991.

Prior to UNCW, Bob served as Fraternity Advisor at Northwestern University in Illinois. He then took the job of Assistant Dean of Students at DePaw University where his position there was similar to his relationship with the Greeks here.

When asked why he applied to the position here, Dean Smith replied, "I was brought to DePaw to lead many changes facing the Greeks there. They were accomplished, I think, successfully as well as several new and additional challenges that arose. Eventually I felt like I had accomplished what I had planned and that it was time to move on. So I applied to this position because I was interested in developing the Greek system here, which still is relatively young."

Smith expressed that the students here are what he enjoys the most. When he initially moved into his office, the first thing he did was rearrange the furniture so it would be a more relaxed atmosphere between the students and himself.

Smith feels the biggest challenge now is that the Greek system has yet to have developed a tradition here. He states, "One of my biggest frustrations is when I've proposed new programs and procedural changes, there is a resistance to change, a fear of the unknown. People say they've always done it that way but it's only been for a couple of years. There are not many traditions, but they do not want any changes either."

Smith would like to see changes in several areas for the Greeks here. They include developing stronger alumni organizations, utilizing their alumni advisors more, and most importantly, developing some sort of risk management policy.

"I am disappointed that IFC has yet to adopt a Risk Management Policy. We are one of few in the country that have not. I truly believe that the ability or inability to better manage risk will determine whether or not the Greek system will survive into the next century. It is the single greatest challenge that faces the system nationally," expressed Smith.

Bob also feels that, "Many things we've been asked to change are really going back to our true traditions. All questions that arise for the groups could be answered simply by following these values expressed in our rituals."

Panellenic Rush Director, Heather Butler, gave her opinion about Dean Smith and his new proposals. "I had my doubts about Bob because I didn't think people would respond to him as well as they did to the previous Greek Advisor. He's a person for change in the Greek system and these were changes we weren't used to on our campus. Now I have totally changed my opinion of him. I think he has good ideas, he's practical, he gets along well with students, and I know he will continue to better our Greek system."

Besides the changes he would like to see, Smith also commented that he is rather pleased with several things the Greeks have done this semester, "... particularly the number of Greeks at the Take Back the Night march, as well as the program on sexual violence. Greeks Advocating Mature Management of Alcohol (GAMMA) has been very active this year and there has been a number of community service projects also."

Yet Greek affairs is not all that occupies this man's time. When Bob is not attending a meeting he enjoys traveling, reading, and is a great baseball fan. He does a lot of work with his fraternity and, in warm weather, can frequently be found at the beach. Bob also shared his feelings that he does not ever aspire to be Dean of Students, he is perfectly happy now having, "high contact with the students."

So as I sat there listening to him speak in his casual clothes and Bucks, I realized that there is a lot more to this person than meets the eye. He told me a story about an experiment he was in when he first arrived here. He and some others were lined up and a group of people were asked to guess things about them. They thought he was conservative, married, a Republican, and drove a foreign car, especially because of his hair being short, all of which are not true. Bob is one of the most liberal persons you will meet. As Dean Smith phrased it, "There is a moral to this story. We all may fit into stereotypes, most of which are wrong. It is easy to be fooled by such stereotypes but they may cause you to miss something you shouldn't, or to see something that is not there."

So if you happen to be in the Dean of Students office or in Greek Affairs, stop by and see this man behind the title. I'm sure you will find him an intriguing person, just as I did during this interview.

Last Saturday, March 20, Sigma Alpha Epsilon biked to Raleigh for the Brigade Boys Club. They raised $1,200 for their journey which was well deserved for all their efforts. They were followed by many Brothers as well as supporters who then celebrated with them at N.C. State upon their arrival.

Chi Omega and Delta Sigma Phi held a car wash last Sunday with all proceeds going to the Respite Home of Wilmington. A total of $125 was donated to the renovation of the home. Special and sincere thanks to all who donated their time, money, and dirty cars!

The Eleventh Annual UNCW Guest Artist Jazz Festival will be held March 26-28 in Kenan Auditorium and the University Center. This year's guest artist will be trumpeter Dominic Spera, whose contributions to music have gained international recognition in the jazz curriculum area as well as the performing arts.

Events include high school and college jazz band performances with clinics in the University Center Ballroom from 12-5 p.m. on Friday, March 26. Friday evening the UNCW Septet will perform at 8:00 p.m. in the University Center's Center Stage Cafe. Saturday performances and clinics will continue in Kenan Auditorium from 12-5 p.m. Sunday evening at 8:00, Dominic Spera (pictured above) will perform with the seven o'clock Jazz Ensemble at Kenan Auditorium.

For ten years, Spera performed professionally in New York City doing work in television and recording studios which included the City Center Ballet Orchestra, Radio City Symphony, Roxy Theater Orchestra, and played lead trumpet in several Broadway shows, including "How To Succeed In Business," "Stop The World I Want To Get Off," and "On A Clear Day You Can See Forever."

Tony "Lost In The" Woods

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Arts and Entertainment Editor

The Association for On Campus Entertainment (ACE) had comedian Tony Woods scheduled for a show Monday, March 22, 1993 in the ballroom of the University Center.

However, after the audience sat waiting for an additional hour past the announced start time for the show to begin, it was announced that Tony Woods would not appear. Why?

Woods, a comedian that has appeared on Def Comedy Jam as well as other various comedy shows was supposed to fly from Chicago to Raleigh and then travel by car to UNCW for the 8:00 p.m. show. However, in a call from Woods around 7:30 p.m., he stated that he had missed his flight from Chicago, was running behind schedule, and had to catch another plane. At the time of the call, he stated he was in Raleigh and would be in Wilmington around 9:15 p.m. Woods would catch a ride with his cousin to UNCW. As the 9:15 p.m. show time came closer, another call came through to ACE from Woods. This time, his cousin's car had broken down in Raleigh therefore prohibiting him from getting to UNCW. The show had to be canceled.

Over 150 people had gathered in the University Center Ballroom to see Tony Woods perform. ACE had contracted Woods for $1200. Needless to say, Woods will not receive any of this money.

These unprofessional actions reflect badly upon Woods and his management company, for whom we will not mention. The main thing I want to get across to the students that waited is that ACE is not to blame for this misfortunate turn of events. Hopefully, the next act will handle themselves in a more mature, professional way.

Life is a funny thing. I have been writing for The Seahawk for over a year now, and I hardly EVER hear anything about articles that I write. Well, that's not exactly true. Every Sunday, I get a call from my mother in Greensboro. After the forecast of the upcoming week's weather (thank you Cablevision of Greensboro for giving my mother the Weather Channel), I get the run down of all the typos and spelling errors in the current edition of The Seahawk.

Along with my "Mom editor," close friends usually comment on how incorrect and off base I am with movie reviews. In other words, I hardly ever hear "Gee Neal, that was a cool article!" or "Golly, that was a GREAT article, I enjoyed reading it! Write more!" But, ever since the

Not Just For Psychiatrists

BY MATT JORGENSEN
Arts and Entertainment Writer

A lull in the live music scene has forced me to do some soul searching to find something to write on. A conversation I had the other day made me realize that there are many people who do not understand the game of Dungeons and Dragons. Simply put, this game published by TSR, Inc. is a role playing game.

Role playing is something that is used widely by psychiatrists as well as many high school gifted and talented programs across this nation. On an elementary level, role playing is the act of putting yourself in someone else's place. In the doctor's office, role playing allows two or more individuals to relate what they feel the other is thinking. Most gifted and talented programs in high school use Dungeons and Dragons to stimulate imagination as well as higher brain functions.

In D&D, the game is simply imagined. There is no board to play on and each player has his or her own opinion of what is going on. The referee gives the players a hypothetical situation and they have to assume the roles of their characters to react to it. This game gives you a reason to spend a rainy afternoon in the house gaming with a group of good friends. No harm is done and everyone gets to exercise their brain via a mythical land of swords and sorcery. Individuals who supposedly go crazy playing this game are bound to have many other mental stressors related to their condition. Dungeons and Dragons is just an excuse on the same level as blaming problems on rock music.

Whether or not you know anything about Dungeons and Dragons, I hope this article has shed light on the subject and cleared things up for you. I welcome rebuttals on the subject. Just submit any questions or comments to the Arts and Entertainment Editor of The Seahawk.

Opera House Theatre Company is proud to present the premiere of THINK OF ME IN JANUARY, a new comedy by Wilmington playwright Steve E. Cooper. Cooper, who wrote last season's surprise hit THE LAMBDA, also directs THINK OF ME IN JANUARY.

THINK OF ME IN JANUARY explores the occasionally turbulent friendship between two roommates, Michael, an obsessive bank teller, played by Hank Troscianiec, and Becky, a free-spirited automobile mechanic, played by Denise S. Bass. Also appearing are D. Anthony Pender as Darryl, a deceptively insightful ex-carnival barker and the couple's only mutual friend, and Jason Evans as Paul, a naive, local television personality. This play is intended for mature audiences.

THINK OF ME IN JANUARY plays at 8:00 p.m. in the Studio Theatre of Thalian Hall, 310 Chestnut Street, Wilmington, N.C., March 24-28 and April 2-4, 1993. Tickets are $10.00. For information and reservations, call the Center Box Office Monday through Saturday from 12:00 noon to 8:00 p.m., at 343-3664, 763-3398, or 1-800-523-2820.

release of the March 18, 1993 edition of The Seahawk, my life changed. People actually commented on my article about Jamaica and seemed to ENJOY reading it. It's funny, the only time people comment on my writing is when I tell about third world soldiers pointing loaded machine guns at me, wallets getting stolen, being offered every drug in the world, and drinking Red Stripe beer. You people are really sick.

Anyway, if you guys enjoy hearing about my life and its interesting twists and turns, then you should get a kick out of this one.

One thing I believe HIGHLY in is the "clean car" concept. I feel that an individual's personality reflects highly on the appearance of their transportation. Please note, I understand that many of you drive bicycles and ride skateboards. I will not comment on bicycles because of the one that I own. It's "pinkness" and Wal-Mart apiece does nothing to represent me. Yes folks, I bought the $64.99 cheapie when I was a freshman just to get around. The beach cruiser is currently rusting away behind Suite Q.

As I was mentioning before, an individual's personality usually reflects in their car. When it boils right down to it, it really isn't the car, but the actual shape it is kept in. I find it entertaining to spend free time washing and cleaning my car. I make this statement to justify its relevance on the A&E page.

Well, I went to the Advance Auto Parts store on Market Street the other day to purchase some cleaning supplies. To my girlfriend's dismay, I ran around the store like a five year old in the "Candy! Candy!" store. I bought as much as I could to clean every inch of the car. After standing in line forever, it was my turn to check out. I didn't have enough cash on hand so I charged everything to my VISA. Please note, VISA is not accepted at Rick's Cafe in Negrele, Jamaica. (See the popular March 18, 1993 edition of The Seahawk).

The cashier lady was already distressed at me because I attempted to remove the $1.00 rebate stickers from two Armorrall bottles without success. Actually, I ripped them off with vigorous force and she promptly told me that she "hated it when customers took off the rebate stickers" because we can never do it right. Oh well, Advance Auto Part training I guess. Anyway, when I handed her the VISA card, I thought she was going to have a nervous breakdown. The charge was the last straw in a day of misery. She quickly took the card and said, "Oh! I can't believe this! I'll be back in seven minutes!" I'm not positive as to why she said this, but I had a feeling that she had to get the approval code from one of those "Zon, Jr." machines and it sometimes took extended periods of time. Here is the entertaining part. The redneck guy next in line suddenly turned to me and said, "Seven minutes! I might as well go take a dump." So, next time you are standing in a line for at LEAST seven minutes, just think that time could have been better spent taking a "dump." Only in America folks, only in America.

Switching directions, if you haven't heard already, the new P.M. Dawn album is out and available in stores. I went to Tracks on Tuesday and bought it. The album is entitled P.M. Dawn: The Bliss Album...? I have been listening to it for a while now and in my opinion, it blows away their first release, The Utopian Experience. The songs are very similar to the original album but seem more upbeat and less repetitious. The first release from Bliss, Looking Through Patient Eyes is my personal favorite due to the beautiful lyrics and the under sampling from George Michael's Father Figure. The popular I'd Die Without You from the Boomerang soundtrack also appears on this album as well as a Techno style song called Plastic. If you like the style of P.M. Dawn, you will definitely enjoy this album.

For those of you who have memories of childhood (like myself) when listening to the song Cats in the Cradle, you can experience the lyrics live Friday, March 26, 1993 with the new rendition performed by Ugly Kid Joe at The Mad Monk. Tickets are on sale now, so you better hurry before this show sells out!

The Mad Monk just announced that The Amateurs will be performing Saturday, March 27, 1993. This should be a good show.

Well folks, that pretty much sums up my week to date. I was hoping to receive my Entertainment Weekly magazine to get my Hollywood gossip, but the last three issues are lost in the mail somewhere. Can you believe that? Mail getting lost? How silly. Until next time!

Nutrition: Getting the Facts Straight

Everyday, we are told about reports on foods that help or hurt us. This may explain why we often believe myths about food. Usually these ideas relate to a notion that a certain food can improve our health, athletic ability, or reduce our weight.

Here are some common food myths:

*Bread, potatoes, and pasta are fattening. Not True! Starchy foods have long been accused of causing weight gain, but the toppings we love to add to them are the real culprits.

*Grapefruit juice burns fat. Not True! No food can burn body fat. In fact, 6 ounces of grapefruit juice contains 80 calories. Dieters who experience weight loss with grapefruit juice have merely substituted the lower calorie juice for a higher calorie food.

*Eating "lite" foods are a good way to lose weight. Not necessarily! The term, "lite", does not have a legal definition and it can refer to many factors: such as salt, sodium, sugar, the amount of breadings, fat, calories, or even color. Compare the original item to the lite version to determine what has been modified. Also look closely at the portion size which is often unrealistically small in order to provide less calories, sodium or fat.

* Vitamin supplements can make up for a poor diet. Not completely. Vitamin pills do not provide the energy or fiber found in food. Nutrients are always better absorbed when they enter the body as a component of food. Nature has combined nutrients in foods that complement each other perfectly. There is no harm in taking a daily multi-vitamin that supplies 100% of the RDA, but do not let it take the place of food.

Tales from the Dumpster

BY ERIK TOTTE
Sports Editor

All right all you wild and crazy UNCW sports fanatics, this begins my first installment in (hopefully) a long saga of Tales from the Dumpster. That's right, I am now, officially, the acting sports editor (we have to act since none of us really know what's going on). The great Wayne Williams has stepped down and passed the torch to yours truly. The honor of holding such a post is a great one and I hope I am worthy of serving you, the UNCW student body, in such a capacity (or something like that).

First, a little on the title of this humble editorial column. The former title of the column, "The Outer", was created, presumably when the creator's mind was in the gutter. So to, has this column been created with thoughts and actions centered around an image that could be called a dumpster. You see, many times sports seems to occupy that deep, dark pit of sucking despair we will now refer to as the dumpster.

My first topic for the dumpster will be this thing which we call March Madness. I want to know, what is March Madness? What is this affliction that takes hold of our country every year at this time? Is it the anguish of seeing my home state Nebraska lose in the first round for the "I don't know how many times in a row" time. I would just like to be without a walker when they finally come in a first round game. Maybe it's the fury of my girlfriend who gets disgusted at the fact that during this month I sit in front of the TV for 18 hours of the day watching games and every possible edition of Sports Center including the repeats. Maybe it's the sorrow of seeing our vaunted 'Hawks fall in the semi-finals of the CAA tournament to our worst of enemies ECU.

To tell you the truth I don't really know (yet there were no promises of answer to be found in the dumpster). I think the one I would bet on though would be the continuing frustration of having to watch a team get blown out (like Rhode Island) while another close, exciting game is going on. To make matters worse they show us glimpses of the game and then after we get sufficiently excited the station cuts back to the blow out—truly folks this has to be what March Madness is all about.

Well there it is, my very first installment of Tales from the Dumpster. I hope all of you have gained a little insight and if not that then perhaps a little hindsight ("I'll never type as bad as that Totten-fella that writes for the paper"). Don't forget to tune into next week's exciting edition of TALES FROM THE DUMPSTER.

Womens B-ball coach leaves

Tynes Resigns

BY WAYNE WILLIAMS
Sports Writer

It is a familiar story, in the world of athletics, contract not extended, coach firings, or a coach resigns. Earlier this year soccer coach Jackie Blackmore resigned to "pursue other interests." Now 3-year Women's Head Basketball Coach Sherri Tynes has stepped down from her post effective last Tuesday.

Tynes, 14-68, while directing the Lady Seahawk program commented that because of the recruiting process it would be extremely difficult to move the program forward. "We have made great strides in the program, with the exception of wins but unfortunately, that is the nature of the business."

"We weren't expecting it" commented current UNCW freshmen Amber Blank, who was recruited by Tynes, they (Tynes staff) had our best interest at heart and wanted us to be successful, especially in the classroom."

Tynes, 57-84, was 43-16 at Francis Marion, where she previously coached. Her total record is 57-84 which includes her three seasons at UNCW.

"We just felt we need to build the women's program. We appreciate what Sherri and her staff have put in. We are committed to bringing in a new coach who can provide a winning team for our program."

The search has begun to find the replacement for Tynes, we will list the offering for three weeks, from there we will select candidates, said Athletic Director Miller.

Track Teams Have Strong Showing

BY ERIK TOTTE
Sports Editor

The UNCW men's and women's track teams traveled to Winston Salem this weekend to participate in the Wake Forest Relays. The teams enjoyed their strongest showing of the season with two individual champions and one relay team victory. The Seahawks continued to smash the current school records with a total of seven new school records being set. 23 personal bests were also set in the meet. Nicole Delaine won the 400 meters and also set a new school record with a time of 57.52. Nicole also ran a 54.5 leg in the 400 for the women's record setting Distance Medley Relay which had a total time of 11:59.7. Amy Jackson set a new school record in the 3000 meters (9:52.7). Amy also ran a 4:59.3 1600 leg on the Distance Medley Relay. The men's Distance Medley Team of Tim Cox (12:00/3:06.7), Steve Benfield (4:00/49.3), John Collins (8:00/1:53.2), and Sam Bobbitt (16:00/4:13.9) set a school record and also a new meet record while beating such distance powers as Navy, UNC-Chapel Hill, and Kentucky. Bobbitt also snapped the school record in the 5000 meters with a time of 14:23.5 which qualified him for the East Coast Championships. New School records were also set by John Collins (1:53.6) and Heather Fenton (2:20.2) in the 800 meters. James Jacobs also placed sixth in the hammer throw with a toss of 148-6. The track teams will be in action again March 26-27 in Raleigh for the Raleigh Relays.

Walking on looking back

By WAYNE WILLIAMS
Assistant Editor

"The concept of me getting to play on a team that has so much talent, guys like Tim (Shaw), Reggie (Vance), Keith (Adkins) and one of the better freshmen in the league in Darren Moore, was fine with me. I think that if I had never gotten to play on a minute, I would have been satisfied," said Patrick Boykin reflecting back on getting a chance to be a Division I basketball. Last fall the call came out across UNCW's campus that the men's basketball team might accept a player in a non-scholarship role. Boykin was the man they selected and he accepted this opportunity to fulfill his dream, a chance to play college basketball. Boykin, who played in eight games this season has a statistic line that isn't the most attractive part of being a UNCW player. He was 0 for 4 from the field, didn't attempt to shoot a three, sunk one of four free throws and ended the season with one point. Defensively Boykin grabbed four rebounds on collected two personal fouls, this season. All, both offensive and defensive stats were amassed in sixteen minutes of game play this season.

What was Boykin's biggest disappointment this season? "The last ECU game" was very disappointing to realize that with five seconds left on the clock there was no way to win this game. Because ECU was certainly a team that UNCW could beat, it was just one of those things, if we could of just got rhythm, the outcome may have been different. With twenty five seconds on the clock we were within five and ECU had to put their starters back into the line up because UNCW was such a threat. But with five seconds left it is very disappointing realize that your season is over."

Seaweed win Ultimax Ultimate teams host tourney

BY SUSAN TURNER
Sports writer

The Seaweed (UNCW Women's Ultimate team) returned from Greenville with smiles of victory. They competed at ECU's "Ultimax XX" this past weekend. A perfect weekend for an ultimate frisbee tourney: beautiful weather, friendly folks, and lots of teams (9 women's teams and 15 men's teams). The Seaweed were eager to play Saturday morning, with a 13-2 win over Vassar College. Discs kept flying and the Seaweed kept winning: 13-1 over Tufts and 13-1 over SUNY Purchase. Sunday's play proved to be a little more intense, but the 'Weeds still dominated with a 13-5 win over Cornell, and a 13-9 victory over ECU in the final game. The 'Weeds were awarded a wood carved trophy which was hung at Seaweed Headquarters.

This weekend the ultimate teams are again in action at Brooks Field for the 4th annual Collegiate Easterns Tournament. Teams from all over the nation will be present including Santa Cruz, CA. There will be 20 men's teams and 10 women's teams. Action will be all day Sat-Sun Saturday and Sunday, March 27 and 28.

University Union Organization Revamped

BY CAROLE MEHLE
 Staff Writer

The organization of the University Union is changing July 1.

The Union currently has three areas it concentrates in: Student Activities, "The Leadership Center and Operations." The old scheme required The Leadership Center and Student Activities to report to Moore. The new scheme means that Student Activities will report to Cathy Birmingham, assistant director of the Union.

Birmingham heads the Leadership Center. Moore stressed that none of the programs are being erased and the functions of the Union will not change.

Birmingham labels the change as a merger of programs that used to pool both staff time and money. By doing this, the mission of the departments of the Union will be redefined, said Birmingham.

"The mission is to focus on important activities and organizations," she said.

The change also should make resources more available to students so they can work with both The Leadership Center and the Student Activities Office.

Birmingham said the activities are not as strong as they should be because they are greatly underfunded. She hopes that will change as she requests a budget doubling the $40,000 the Association for Campus Entertainment gets. She added that for a campus this size, there should be a lot more activities, like more than one movie a week and more concerts.

Moore made the decision to merge the two areas and said that it was her intention when The Leadership Center was conceived eight years ago. "The staff has been in place for five years so their skills can be used," she said.

Moore's decision also involved ways of looking at the efficiency with which the Union runs. "This is a crucial time for the Union. It's the second year of a fee increase denial and we need to maximize what we have."

The decision to implement change, announced to the staff in January, will become effective July 1. And Birmingham is already at work on making the process become reality, having worked out an outline and an idea of what role will be played by each employee and what direction the Union program will take. Moore said student employees and students who use the resources of the Union offered ideas as well.

Moore agrees with Birmingham about the mission to strengthen student leaders and organizations and support for them. "Students will more clearly see the advantage of working with and through Student Activities and the Leadership Center...It will benefit campus life for everybody."

$50 cash prize, among others Seahawk Spirit Week Kicks Off

BY JIM CLARK
 Editor in Chief

The Chancellor's Office, in an attempt to improve intracampus communications and relations, has announced that the week of April 19-23 will be used for campus-wide unifying activities.

"In our continuing efforts to emphasize the fact that we are One University, One Team and have One Goal," Chancellor James Leutze said, "we have decided to try something new."

That something new is a campus-wide "Seahawk Search" and campus softball tournament. The Search requires individuals or teams to visit 20 different locations on campus to pick up a puzzle piece. There is a catch though. No one is told where the pieces are.

A participant must enter an academic, academic support, or administrative building and go from office to office asking, "Are you the puzzle pieces keeper?"

Diane Billings, a member of the Seahawk Search committee, said, "There is no more than one piece in a building. There will be no pieces in any residence halls or student housing buildings."

The search hours will be from 8 a.m.-5 p.m. Monday-Thursday. Once all 20 pieces have been collected, the individual or team must turn in the completed puzzle to the Chancellor's Office before 5 p.m. Thursday. The presenter must have a valid UNCW ID to claim a prize and enter for the grand prize, four golf passes to Porter's Neck.

Prizes include $50 cash, a $100 UNCW Bookstore gift certificate, free scuba lessons from Aquatic Safari, restaurant gift certificates from Eddie Romanelli's, Katy's Great Eats, P.T.'s and others, t-shirts from Hot Wax Surf Shop and the UNCW Bookstore, movie passes, tickets to see Carrot Top, plus many others.

On Friday, April 23, at 3:30 p.m., there will be a softball tournament. Teams must comprise of 5 men and 5 women and sign-up by Wednesday in the Office of Recreation and Intramural Programs. Teams can call Bryan Cooper at 395-3598 to register. Drop-in teams on game day are welcome as well. Players are reminded to bring their own gloves to the games.

At the game, hot dogs and soft drinks will be available for 50 cents each and ID PLUS cards may be used. Surf 107 and Coast 97.3 will be doing live remotes from the field.

Red Cruise, of Coast 97.3, says there will be Coast DJs at the field available to play.

Doug Carlisle of Surf 107 said students will be able to sign up for their "Loyal Listener" card at the Surf 107 remote station.

Surf 107 will be broadcasting from 3:30-4:30, and Coast 97.3 from 5-7.

Participants in the softball games are encouraged to wear their favorite UNCW or Earth Day t-shirt to show their Seahawk Spirit.

The grand prize, the four golf passes to Porter's Neck, will be given away at 4:30 Friday. You do not have to present to win.

"The fun and rewards will be obvious," Chancellor Leutze said, "but the serious purpose is to emphasize the importance of people getting to know each other and learn more about their university. I think this is a good idea and encourage everyone to participate."

It's here!

Atlantis contributing editor Jeff Nelson reads from his collection of poetry Wednesday evening.

UNCW Literary Magazine Published

BY JIM CLARK
 Editor in Chief

Last night, the 33rd edition of the Atlantis, UNCW's student literary and art journal, was unveiled. Contributors, staff, and appreciators of the arts listened to readings from the journal and art work from the publication were on display around the University Living Room.

The journal, which is made entirely of student works chosen for publication by students, is published annually. Student contributions are sought from September through February and then the editing process begins. The staff had plenty to choose from this year.

Kelly Mast, editor in chief of the Atlantis, was pleased with the journal and its entries. "We got a good representation of the tastes and talents of the students of the university."

Assistant Editor Maria Tabor said of the magazine, "It's a great way for students to let the world know what we think in this day and age."

This publication recognizes students whose talents might go unrecognized otherwise.

Dean of Students Pat Leonard said the journal recognizes students who "provide a significant contribution through their writings."

The Atlantis will be available in the University Union and Center, the library, Morton Hall, and Kenan Hall.

"I want to thank everyone for their time and effort," Mast said. "I would also like to thank the students who submitted stories, poems, and artwork. The more submissions we get, the better the magazine."

Campus Police Officer Arrested

BY AMY BRENNAN
 Staff Writer

A UNCW police officer was arrested on two counts of felony embezzlement after pawing and then attempting to return a pistol he had confiscated from a student on campus.

Tommy Mason, a UNCW officer of about 18 months, was arrested on Feb. 26 after an internal investigation.

The investigation revealed that Mason had pawned a 9mm pistol that he had confiscated from a student. When police officials noticed the gun was missing, Mason returned to the Jacksonville pawn shop and traded the pistol for his department issue .357 magnum. His attempt to return the pistol to the department sparked the investigation.

Chief Billy W. Dawson commented, "Anytime you've got 20 employees working for you one's going to make a mistake," Dawson told the Star News, "It's not something we're proud of, but we're not ashamed either."

Dawson was unreachable for further comment.

Wednesday UNCW announced a land donation valued at $1.2 million. The land donation was made by the owners of Wilmington Pepsi Bottling Company.

UNCW Alumnus Art On Display

BY JOHN BRYAN
 Staff Writer

The African, and the African-American experience in the rural South, are the themes of artist Harry Davis' work. The artist will return to the campus Friday, April 16, from 4:00 to 6:00 p.m. to talk about his new paintings. Most of the UNCW community will remember Mr. Davis' work from his collection that was showcased in the library last semester.

Harry Davis is a 1979 UNCW graduate. However, it wasn't art that he studied in school—he majored in sociology.

The Wilmington artist whose artworks have been admired and bought by celebrities such as Denzel Washington and Neil Carter says, "I had no formal art training.... my painting is a God-given talent." In saying that, he does not want anyone to believe that he "just woke up one day and started painting masterpieces." In fact, his first paintings were "crude and amateurish." He realized his talent through a lot of hard work and "trial and error." He also learned by reading many books on painting.

Davis first started painting after being injured while serving in the U.S. Army at Fort Bragg during the early 70's. He grew restless in his wheelchair and discovered painting to be therapeutic.

His themes stem from a strong interest in Africa, being black and growing up in the American South. He gets some of his ideas from images he remembers when he was young. He also conducts research for ideas to use in his paintings—reading old books and magazines, studying old black-and-white photographs, and traveling.

He says that he often hears the adjectives "pride, strength, dignity, agony and sadness" used to describe subjects in his paintings. While he doesn't disagree with these descriptions, he says that these qualities are unintentional. "I just paint what I feel," he says.

When asked if there is any overall message he is trying to convey in his paintings, Mr. Davis is hesitant to offer a manufactured response, preferring instead to let his work speak for itself.

The UNCW Office of Minority Affairs is sponsoring the presentation by Mr. Davis as a special feature of the UNCW Cultural Arts Committee's Spring Fest '93 celebration to be held this weekend. Ralph Parker, who is the director of Minority Affairs, encourages all to come out and meet Harry Davis and hear him talk about his work.

Self Exploration Key To Your Success

Why are we here?

A friend of mine and I were running one day last week (I think if you had seen us you might have thought we were just walking fast), talking about the importance of goals in our lives and how destructive the loss of purpose and drive is to marriages and teaching careers and life in general.

The opposite of a life of purposefulness is a life characterized by aimlessness. It is living without focus or clarity or... purpose, kind of wandering through our days without any sense of direction or drive. I feel as though I see a lot of aimlessness in people these days on campus, aimlessness marked by low energy, limited commitments, lack of openness to self exploration and almost total disinterest in major social issues.

Jeffrey B. Becker

An anonymous author has written, "life does not need comfort, when it can be offered meaning, not pleasure, when it can be shown purpose. Reveal what is the purpose of existence, and how he may attain it—the steps he must take—and man will go forward again happily, happily, knowing that he has found what he must have—intentional living—and knowing that an effort, which takes all his energy because it is worth his full and constant concentration, is the only life deserving the devotion, satisfying the nature and developing the potentialities of a self-conscious being."

Beyond all the potential of gaining knowledge, job skills and all the other benefits of higher education, I believe the development of sense of direction, a sense of intention (i.e. goals) is a critical part of your educational process. Choosing and working for goals both short term and limited or long term and life fulfilling is an energizing process in itself. Becoming intentional in itself generates excitement and satisfaction to the point that some report feeling a little let down when a goal is achieved because the process was so rich and fulfilling in working toward that goal.

Why are you here? What do you want out of this day, this semester, this organization, this relationship and your life? What pieces are you ready to begin working on? The answers are not simple nor static; the question is one we live with and answer at all of our days, and the answers are as varied as the people who ask. Nevertheless we need to be goal setting and goal seeking persons not only to achieve, but because the process helps us to become purposeful and intentional people, people who find in each new day an adventure and in every problem a challenge. The only way to avoid the feeling that life is happening to you is to begin to make life happen for you.

Phil Gives In To Groupies' Pressure

A near tragedy occurred early last week as thousands of weary UNCW students, distraught over the reported retirement of NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith, attempted to jump off of the Cape Fear River Bridge. Tragically, we averted however, as all the students landed safely on the newly recommissioned USS North Carolina as it was sailing out to sea on its maiden voyage. Yes friends, in a series of developments more bizarre than the Bobby Cremins story, I would like to announce that I AM NOT QUITTING. Perhaps it was a miscalculation on my part, or just a bad April Fool's joke, but none the less, you must all now put up with me for another year.

In national news, the US Food and Drug Administration last week ordered the recall of some eight billion pick up trucks manufactured by General Motors over the past several years. Officials claim that a "nasty parasite" has been discovered in the side mounted fuel tanks and apparently caused thousands of cases of diarrhea in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. General Motors officials responded sharply, claiming that "We know those parasites were placed in those fuel tanks by NBC field correspondents, and we're not about to have any recall." NBC officials could not be found for comment.

You wouldn't believe what I got in the mail the other day. It was an "official notification" from Publishers Clearing House notifying me that I had been selected as a finalist in the $5 TEN MILLION DOLLAR $5 sweepstakes. It said that if my personal entry number is the one chosen by Ed McMahon on May 29, I will win TEN MILLION DOLLARS $5. Much to my dismay, I later learned that all of my neighbors, my mom, three cousins, and my dog ("Mr. Rover Smith") were also selected as finalists. Go figure.

Have any of you seen these new shoe things that you hop around in? I'm serious, the shoes have a round metal bottom which serves as a spring to let you hop around like a disturbed kangaroo. I have seen the commercials and was alerted to this display of ignorance by a semi-coherent reader who said "Phil, it was the stupid thing I've seen since the Magic Poty Baby." Things that make you go "Hmmm!"

As I celebrate the recent Easter holiday I was reminded of one the more disgusting aspects of our capitalist society. Now I'm sure the first thing that comes to your mind is of course Amway, but that's not this week's topic. What I want to focus on is commercialism. Yes friends, we live in a society that will use any means to sell a car, boat or even gently overnight laxatives.

I noticed that problem on the way to work the other day when I heard a commercial for Honey Baked Ham. "Easter just wouldn't be the same without a Honey Baked Ham," the announcer claimed. Now just what does Honey Baked Ham have to do with Easter? Does the Easter Bunny like Honey Baked Hams now? I don't think so! (Incidentally, my mother called and sang, it its entirety, "Here comes Peter Cottontail" on my answering machine last Sunday.) And I seriously doubt that a transcript from the Last Supper would include the line, "Hey Judas, how about passing the Honey Baked Ham."

Moving along to this week's HATS OFF award. This prestigious honor is awarded this week to the girls who wrote in, expressing their dismay at my announced retirement. To the one who "cared enough to send my very best" and the other who stated she would be "back to just reading Cosmo," I sincerely apologize for any mental anguish I caused. If I can show how much I care, you, PLEASE send me your name, box number, phone number and perhaps a photo. It's the least I can do, aside from saying HATS OFF to you both.

The SHOES OFF award this week goes to the Editor and Staff of The Seahawk, for the last issue dated April 1, 1993. I was shocked and appalled at the fact that they would stoop so low as to print such inaccurate fallacies. Imagine my anger after I sat out in the cold rain for three hours, waiting for President Clinton to show up. Feel the embarrassment I felt as the Chancellor's secretary laughed at me when I inquired about the USS North Carolina cruise. Consider the shame I endured as I called back the seventy-five people I had invited to the James Taylor concert. I have no choice but to award SHOES OFF to the creative staff at The Seahawk for a job well done.

Commission, also in Raleigh. They told me to write them letter. That was five weeks ago, and I'm still waiting for a response.

I wrote a letter to the Chancellor, the Vice Chancellor, the Dean, the Assistant Dean, the Compliance Officer, the Director and Assistant Director of Public Service, and the Student Government Association.

I finally heard from some Special Assistant to the Chancellor for BS, BS, BS in some back office in the Administration building. No one else responded, not even the SGA, who supposedly represents all students and their concerns. This "Special Assistant" was very condescending, giving me fatherly advice, telling me what's right and wrong, and telling me what life is all about. He also claimed that there were other reasons for not replying to me, mostly dismissing the reason I was given. He said the Chancellor would be in touch. That was well over three weeks ago. I'm still waiting.

Minorities: Embrace The Gay Rights Momentum or Discredit Your Own

At the beginning of last semester in a Social Work class I was enrolled in, another enrolled student flatly announced to the class that being gay was "wrong." What was surprising and disappointing about that was this student was an African-American woman. In all fairness to her, it must be said that this type of fear-based thinking is like a virus, one that we are exposed to repeatedly from childhood onward and that is therefore easy to catch. However, such an opinion is not reconcilable with the experience of having been discriminated against based on an opposition to a gay rights initiative; opposition which is not recognizable with the memory of one's own arduous struggle for civil rights.

Members of a religious, ethnic or racial minority who engage in homophobia or discrimination against gays not only forfeit the unadulterated movement toward equitable treatment of all but also discredit the history and integrity of their own group's civil rights struggle.

Perhaps because the African-American civil rights movement was one of the most notable in American history, a spate of recent interviews has focused on black reaction to gay rights. Surprisingly, a sizable number resent the comparison of the gay movement with their own, citing the fallacious argument that gays "choose their lot" and that it is an issue of morality not civil rights. The focus on blacks is a little unfair as there are adherents to this type of thinking in many minority communities, but the African-American example is a particularly salient one.

It has been suggested that anti-gay sentiment among some blacks comes from the fact that to a large extent their own civil rights struggle was based in the conservative black Christian church; invalidation of the gay movement are consequently based on religious dogma. However, this forgets the history of discrimination against blacks in this country, much of which was also based on religious dogma. The enslavement of "heathen" Africans was justified by Genesis 9:25-27, according to many white slave masters. In his book Rescuing the Bible from Fundamentalism, Bishop John Shelby Spong of the Episcopal Church points out that as late as the 1960's many conservative white Christians still used these verses to justify segregation. Add to this the fact that some whites viewed blacks as morally and intellectually inferior, and it becomes easy to see that black civil rights threatened to erode the moral fiber and integrity of the American way of life as envisioned by these whites. Today the religious right is issuing the same type of protests about the gay initiative, predictably quoting religious dogma. Joining this irrational rhetoric is one way for blacks or any other minority that has experienced this type of discrimination to imperil the credibility of their own struggle against it.

Another way for a minority to endanger the integrity of its movement is to separate itself from the gay struggle because it wishes to avoid controversy. Perhaps this is the real motive of people who distinguish between discrimination against their own group and the same behavior against gays, apparently implying that the latter is acceptable. This is, simply, defensiveness. There is nothing "safe" about the issue of civil rights; it is endemically controversial. For a group to shelter its struggle from the contention caused by reaction to another group's exclusionary self-interest, you must be willing to eradicate the language of discrimination as it applies to all people; to do anything less is merely to pass the burden to being victimized by it from one group to another.

If the structure of bias is allowed to remain intact, then it can imprison again groups that have already known its formidable lead walls. In November of last year, a measure appeared on the Oregon ballot that would have killed municipal or local ordinance forbidding discrimination based on social orientation. The group that put the measure on the ballot encapsulated its stance in the fervent slogan "no special rights of homosexuals." Extremely misleading in its implications, such a distorted slogan calls to mind virulent catch phrases of similar intent in the anti-affirmative action backlash of the treatment "became the artillery used to dismantle hard-won legislative gains for minorities. Women, Asian-Americans or Hispanics who rally behind the same type of hysteria being leveled against gays are reinforcing the superstructure of institutionalized prejudice that continually threatens their own well-being."

Not the least significant among incentives to prevent religious pederasty from interfering with the dialogue on gay rights would be the continued observance of the separation of church and state that this country's founders insisted on. The labeling of homosexuality as immoral emanates from an uncompromisingly literal interpretation of the Judeo-Christian Biblical text; the same literalism would have to espouse a second-class status for women, to condone slavery and encourage religious bigotry, all of which are featured in the text. Let it be said that the Bible contains one of the greatest tutorials on love that has ever been written, and some of lessons and truths have become valuable cornerstones for the spiritual edification of Christians and non-Christians alike. However, its other more antiquated and confusing concepts should not be allowed to invade our societal structure. The impeding of pro-gay legislation based on Judeo-Christian religious arguments presents a test to our time-honored tradition of a secular state. If the state buckles then the governing structure comes a step closer to resembling the particular theology that was allowed to direct it. It's just a thought; but to Non-Christian religious minorities, already sensitive to the institutionalized religious elitism of albeit fewer and fewer Christians, it is a thought that has been known to cause some discomfort.

But perhaps the most damaging effect of a minority group's anti-gay behavior is that it is internally divisive. We as gay people exist in just about every community in this nation; Some of us are you, and some of you are us. You are cutting yourselves off from a source of strength. In addition, anti-gay sentiment denies a minority group access to some of its heritage and contributions. Some of your leaders, spiritual advisers, artists and organizers were, or are gay. But saddest of all, you are cutting yourselves off from your own conscience. If you continue to resist the gay rights movement, then when the struggle is over and gays emerge victorious you will not be remembered as a vanguard of human dignity and equality but rather as a source of continued disparaging and discrimination. If you are a member of a minority group that has suffered from these same forces that nothing could be more embarrassing, disappointing—or avoidable.

Student Claims Discrimination

Editor: Last summer I worked as an Assistant Director for a marine science camp that is run by UNCW's Division for Public Service. When I went up for the position again this summer, I was not rehired. I was told that they "decided to have an all-girl staff this year." They avoided any further conversation. I'm not sure I could convey to you the infuriation that this act of sexual discrimination caused me.

I called an attorney referral service, then three attorneys. One finally told me to call New Hanover County Human Relations Commission. It wasn't under their jurisdiction. I called some state organization in Raleigh. I wasn't really classified as a state employee. I called the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, also in Raleigh. They told me to write them letter. That was five weeks ago, and I'm still waiting for a response.

I wrote a letter to the Chancellor, the Vice Chancellor, the Dean, the Assistant Dean, the Compliance Officer, the Director and Assistant Director of Public Service, and the Student Government Association.

I finally heard from some Special Assistant to the Chancellor for BS, BS, BS in some back office in the Administration building. No one else responded, not even the SGA, who supposedly represents all students and their concerns. This "Special Assistant" was very condescending, giving me fatherly advice, telling me what's right and wrong, and telling me what life is all about. He also claimed that there were other reasons for not replying to me, mostly dismissing the reason I was given. He said the Chancellor would be in touch. That was well over three weeks ago. I'm still waiting.

My last resort could be to find an attorney who will represent me. I'm paying my own way through college, so how could I possibly afford legal fees?

I am a young white male. I empathize with all the minorities that have had to deal with discrimination for years, but they are not alone. I have been discriminated against, blown off, given the run around, put off, made to feel inferior, outwardly lied to, and dealt with in a very condescending way, and there is absolutely nothing that I can do about it.

To all of those who claim to be "liberated" in this society, "who will go to great lengths to stamp out discrimination and injustices," don't give me your self-righteous bull shit.

Sincerely,
Stephen W. Eastman

Motorist, Not Bicyclist, Are The Problem

Editor: Why is it that we cyclists who are motivated enough to bike to class each morning have had to put up with all the recent biker bashing?

Lately I have heard one too many complaints from angry motorists who are too lazy to come up with any hard core support for their views. It's time for someone to point out some of the positive aspects of biking and how it benefits even you—THE MOTORIST.

The most obvious benefit to all is clean air, less cars on the road equals less pollution. I bet not many motorists have considered the fact that less cars on the road means you can get to class faster because there is less traffic. Furthermore, the less students driving to class means it will be that much easier to find an empty parking space.

I was disappointed by the letter last week that stated "After paying $80.00 for a sometimes useless parking permit, it is the motorized vehicle owner who should be allowed to park at the building door." Come on!! If all individuals who presently bike to class decided to purchase parking permits the fee would probably increase even more in response to demand.

I have ridden my bike to class every day for four years. One of the things I most enjoyed about the campus of UNCW is all the trees. Now, some of the areas of campus that were for the most part undeveloped have been replaced by parking lots to accommodate the large number of students who choose to drive to class. I personally would rather ride my bike to campus and look at a forest than drive to class and gaze at the beautiful... parking lot.

Many motorists have pointed out the failure of some cyclists to abide by the rules. Fine, I can attest to that. I can also tell you that I have come close to being hit several times by drivers who fail to come to a complete stop when they approach a stop sign.

The bottom line is we all need to be responsible for our own actions. By doing so we will be cautious and less likely to cause problems for others. I challenge motorists to stand back and take a look at the root of the problem. Where does it stem from, and why are you so angry at what you have created? Lastly, try riding a bike to class one day, the exercise may help relieve some tension.

Finally A Group That Neal Writes About! New York's Hottest: TKA

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Ever since my trip to New York City last summer, I have been a faithful listener to the music of TKA. Since TKA is not known to many of us in the South, I thought it would be beneficial to my wonderful readers to learn a little about the group. Most of the students at UNCW who are from New Jersey or New York are familiar with TKA's "freestyle" sound and hip-hop beat as well as their clear messages and emotions that are mixed into every one of their songs.

It's taken me four months and a lot of phone calls and letters to receive a press packet on these guys and I finally received it last Tuesday. So, with that in mind, prepare to learn all about TKA.

The letters stand for Tony, Kayel, and Angel, three dynamic singers from New York City. But it also means outstanding melodies, seductive vocals and slamming dance rhythms. TKA has proven themselves to be one of the most successful dance crossover acts of the last seven years, becoming one of the hottest club, video, and recording acts around. It all began with their recording debut in 1985, the explosive, high energy Scars Of Love, which spawned six Billboard dance hits, with three cuts hitting the Top Ten. Then there was 1991's Louder Than Love. That album and most notably the passionate title track catapulted TKA to the forefront of the pop and dance scenes. All of which brings us to 1992, and the release of TKA's Greatest Hits. It is filled with the sweet and sultry grooves that have made them New York City's foremost ambassadors of freestyle and have taken the trio from the streets all the way to the top. Maria, the current single, is a huge club record.

TKA has always done things with their own sense of style and direction. Their gritty determination, combined with an unbeatable sound and street smarts, has brought them resounding success and scores of new fans. The group, with guidance from manager and producer Joey Gardner, recorded the song Louder Than Love. Not surprisingly, radio fell in love with the song and it soon went Top 40. TKA then produced a video clip for the cut, which proved to be as hot visually as the song was sonically. "There were no real outlets for this type of music," Joey Gardner explains, "at least not for videos. So we did a video that we tailored towards the Video Jukebox Network (a cable show where the views pay for video requests and hence serve as de-facto programmers) and it paid off." The starkly romantic black and white clip, which featured some controversial nude scenes of TKA, became a huge underground sensation, staying in the network's Top 10 play list for over three months and firmly establishing TKA as a groundbreaking act.

TKA were discovered by Gardner at a sweet sixteen party, where they were laying down sweet love song harmonies over the hard-core beats of rap records. Gardner, (also responsible for signing Information Society), signed TKA to Tommy Boy. Taking the same concept that had caught his ear at the party, he transferred it to the studio; the result was Scars Of Love. "Our songs are drawn from personal experiences with love and relationships," comments Kayel, a prolific writer who has penned many of the groups hits, including Maria. "We're young and we have a great deal yet to be exposed to in life, but the same goes for our fans. It's difficult to be young and in love. We experience a lot of ups and downs, and we try to let the fans know it's alright to feel the way they do."

That empathy and universal approach has taken TKA around the world and into towns and cities where the seemingly "Urban" freestyle beat might seem alien; TKA has shown that their sound translates to a wide range of fans. The group performs over 200 shows a year. Television appearances include Showtime At The Apollo, Nia Peelle's Party Machine, Dance Party USA, and Club MTV. They have donated their time for several public service announcements, speaking out against violence in schools and drugs. TKA has shared the stage with Donna Summer, Boyz II Men, Paula Abdul, and Tracy Spencer. They were also the winners of the New York Music Awards Best Dance Artist of 1990 honors.

1993 is gearing up to be another big year for TKA. With Maria already surpassing Louder Than Love in sales, and with the group ready to begin their third record, TKA is setting their sights higher than ever.

The Entertaining World

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Now that everyone is back from our glorious Easter Break, it's time to make a few announcements before we buckle down and prepare for final exams.

First of all, I would like to thank the wonderful student population at UNCW as well as the community of Wilmington for accepting the April Fool's Edition of The Seahawk. We worked extremely hard to make the issue enjoyable for all and I think it was a total success.

I would like to give a hardy round of applause to Chris Ray and Jennifer Bender for actually calling The Seahawk offices concerning the James Taylor tickets. Gotcha!

Speaking of the mysterious ticket sales, I would like to thank the folks downstairs in the Information Center for all their support and patience in pulling off this joke. I heard from Phil Berger and Kim Dewey (fine employees of the spectacular Information Center) that the phone lines were swamped for most of the day on April 1 and on into the weekend. I would like to apologize, however, for the group of elderly folks that planned a bus trip down to campus to see the President. I guess the picture of Hillary with the caption "President Clinton" under it did not give away the joke. Oh well.

Speaking of Clinton, we received a call from Matt Lauer, Secretary of the North Carolina Federation of Planets and College Democrats Association, Incorporated and Limited concerning the visit by Bill Clinton to UNCW. Mr. Lauer wanted an official reply from the newspaper to the truth value of the article, considering Starfleet Command in Raleigh (or is it the Democratic Headquarters of North Carolina in Raleigh) knew nothing of this visit. Well, Matt, here is your official response from the Arts and Entertainment editor: BILL CLINTON, AS FAR AS WE KNOW, IS NOT PLANNING A VISIT TO THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA AT WILMINGTON. THE ARTICLE YOU READ, AS WELL AS MANY OTHERS IN THE APRIL 1 ISSUE OF THE SEAHAWK WAS AN APRIL FOOL'S JOKE.

For the guy that left a message on the machine displaying the integrity of the staff at The Seahawk, I would like to say, "Calm Down."

Folks, the paper was done as a JOKE. I understand that an extremely unfortunate event occurred the previous weekend and it was attended to on the upside down page. It seems that the negative criticism all resorts back to what I said last week concerning the Sigma Nu pledge talent show act. A lot of things done on campus are done in FUN. For those of you that do not know what fun is, it usually makes a person laugh and is a nifty act to carry through with. This is a college newspaper and we are supposedly experiencing the best days of our life. Why can't we have a little fun without being downplayed? For example, we received a message from a little anonymous winery voice on the answering machine stating the lack of integrity by the editors and writers of The Seahawk. Why can't you say who YOU are if you have so much more INTEGRITY than us.

I have also heard that a few people out there are after my head because of the James Taylor concert article. LOOSEN UP! If Bill Anlyan, Vice Chancellor for University Advancement, can go along (and thoroughly laugh) about an article that basically calls him a crook for misusing state funds (which is FALSE) then why can't everyone else just sit back and laugh at the entire paper?

Anyway, enough about that. I'm not really sure what's going on entertaining this week. I usually write my articles on Sundays and since we didn't have a paper last week, and I was out of town for five days, I'm a little lost.

I did see Indecent Proposal last Wednesday and it was EXCELLENT. Would you give your wife to a multi-billionaire for one night in exchange for one million dollars? That's the question that Woody Harrelson and Demi Moore have to answer in this exciting film. Robert Redford plays the part of the billionaire and was just as magnificent in his role.

Nothing totally interesting happened (entertaining wise) in the life of Neal this week. I was in Charleston, SC, this past weekend for my incredible Fraternity formal and met an interesting fellow. As I was loading my car with luggage on Easter morning to head back to Wilmington, an elderly man sitting in a wheelchair outside the hotel informed me that the devil was coming and I would burn in hell. This took me a little off guard because of my joyous mood, but then he smiled at me and asked me to call a cab for him before I died in hell. I guess he saw the lack of integrity on my face as well and had to harass me.

Well guys, you only have one more paper after this one (excluding the special summer edition for the orientation groups). Next week, I hope to have a little more to say, but I had to get my point across about the April Fool's edition of The Seahawk. Next week, I'll talk about Stevie B's latest album, Healing (thanks to the incredible recommendation by Jennifer Ledford) as well as entertaining things that happen around UNCW.

Until Next Time!

The Tragic Death of Brandon Lee Nightmare on North 23rd Street

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Arts and Entertainment Editor

If you have been ignoring the newspapers and television news broadcasts during the last few weeks then it might be surprising to learn that Brandon Lee, son of the famous Bruce Lee, died in Wilmington last week.

On the last night of his life, Brandon Lee visited Fitness Today before heading over to Carolco Studios for another evening of intense filming on his new film The Crow. The movie, a quick melodrama about a rock musician who returns from the dead to avenge his and his girlfriend's murders, had been a brutal shoot from the start anyway. After leaving Fitness Today, Lee headed for Carolco's soundstage 4. Less than 24 hours later, he was dead. Coroners in Wilmington removed what appeared to be a .44-caliber bullet that had lodged against his spine, then released the body to his family.

Ever since the accident, rumors have spread that encompassed everything from a vendetta by the Chinese Mafia to a curse on his late father. But in all likelihood, the cause of Lee's death is much simpler: Somebody made a mistake.

On March 31 at 12:30 AM, according to Entertainment Weekly's Mark Harris, cameras rolled on soundstage 4 at Carolco studios. Lee's character, Eric, comes through a door carrying a grocery bag and is shot once. Alex Proyas, an Australian music-video director making his first American feature, had cameras capturing two different angles on the scene, as well as a video hookup in one camera to record the action for quick playback.

Actor Michael Massee, who played Funboy, was supposed to fire a .44-caliber revolver at Lee from a distance of about 15 feet, at which point Lee would detonate a squib (a small explosive charge) planted in the grocery bag to simulate the rip-and-shred effect of the bullet. As risky as that may sound, it was nothing compared with a scene that had been filmed just a week earlier in which Lee had been "shot" and "squibbed" about 50 times per take. The Crow's special effects man, J.B. Jones, had years of experience dealing with weapons on the TV series Miami Vice, and stunt coordinator Jeff Vlade was also on the soundstage and had attended rehearsals of the scene, offering advice.

As a crew of between 75 and 100 people looked on, Massee fired the gun, the squib in the grocery bag detonated on cue, and Lee fell to the ground. Not until the scene ended and Lee failed to get up did anyone realize he had been shot.

The cast and crew of The Crow saw that Lee was bleeding from the right side of his abdomen. An ambulance was called, and emergency medical technicians raced the unconscious actor to New Hanover Regional Medical Center. When he was brought in shortly after 1 AM, doctors discovered a silver dollar size entry wound, stabilized him "as best as possible," and rushed him into surgery.

For five hours, they tried to repair extensive vascular and intestinal damage and stem bleeding so severe that Lee was eventually transfused with 60 pints of blood, the equivalent of a full supply for five grown men.

On April 3, as screenwriters reportedly began reworking the story of The Crow, Brandon Lee was buried next to his father in Seattle, Washington.

Preview of "The Mind of the Haunted Professor"

Has your professor been acting at all peculiar lately? Does this normally logical lecturer suddenly grip the desk while talking about a subject, say, a subject like devils and demons? Have you spotted any mysterious messages on the blackboard or heard any cryptic allusions to bats, cats, or bats?

More ominously, is your professor writing a paper for publication?

James Lowry, professor of ethnology at Atworthy College, does just that, and his life, abruptly, becomes a garish, gory nightmare.

The protagonist of L. Ron Hubbard's mesmerizing horror novel, Fear, Lowry writes a paper harshly refuting the existence of devils and demons. After paying a subsequent visit to a fellow professor he discovers, with a frightening adness, that he has lost four hours of his life. On top of that, he lost his hat. Later, the stairway to his house transforms into an endless passage deep into the bowels of the earth, where apparitions breathe strange, allusive messages into the night. "Bats are bats and rats are rats and cats are cats and there is no soup deep enough to drown."

A few of his students notice the odd message scrawled across his blackboard: "You are the entity." No one considers it strange when he impulsively flings an eraser across the room. And, despite the tell-tale signs of things gone menacingly awry, no one sees what Lowry must contend with when not in the classroom: a formless place of night without day, of strange figures out of time, of graves and cold-blooded murder.

The Mind of the Haunted Professor will be available in local bookstores soon.

Today, nearly 1,400 Americans die of cancer. Millions of dollars each year are raised to support the fight against cancer, but this is not enough. The long run goal of the American Cancer Society is to eliminate cancer as a human disease. With your help this can be accomplished.

The men of Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity at UNCW are sponsoring the second annual basketball marathon. They will be playing for over 107 hours non-stop. In their first marathon they raised several thousand dollars. This year they hope to better that amount. The money raised will go to the American Cancer Society honoring Jim Valvano.

Any pledges or donations would be greatly appreciated by the brother of Lambda Chi Alpha, as well as all those fighting this deadly disease. They will be playing Thurs., April 15 through Tues., April 20.

All are invited to come out and help make it as successful as last year's fund-raiser for Kate Mitchell, a 3-year-old bone marrow recipient.

The marathon held was a city-wide effort to find bone-marrow transplants for the Mitchell twins and for the American Cancer Society. Unfortunately, Kate's twin sister, Sydney, died in October 1991 from this rare blood disorder. Miraculously, a donor was found for Kate in February of 1992, and she is now doing great!

ARA Announces Chic-Fil-A® Outlet in Hawk's Nest By Fall

BY K. RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

ARA and Auxiliary Services are moving into a franchise of branded concepts. ARA Services have joined in a license agreement with Chi-Fil-A to build a Chic-Fil-A® outlet in the Hawk's Nest. UNCW is not the first university to have a Chic-Fil-A® on campus. There is a growing number of eleven nationwide, and other North Carolina schools include UNC-Greensboro and UNC-Charlotte.

The Hawk's Nest will be renovated over the summer and is expected to be ready by August. Chic-Fil-A® workers' uniforms will be color coordinated with Chic-Fil-A® and separate from campus dining staff.

The Hawk's Nest will not be in competition with Chic-Fil-A®. As a matter of fact, the manager of the Chic-Fil-A® in Independence Mall will play a major role in assisting with the necessary changes. Also, the Hawk's Nest will make all necessary accommodations for the new outlet.

Furthermore, the Hawk's Nest will not sell any item that Chic-Fil-A® sells, and Chic-Fil-A®'s prices on campus will be the same as the price list of the Chic-Fil-A® in Independence Mall. Students will be able to purchase Chic-Fil-A® items through flex and declining balance, as well as cash.

Director of Auxiliary Services, Charlie Maimone is really looking forward to the various changes. Due to the renovations, "We are looking into adding an adjoining outdoor patio to the Hawk's Nest. Also, the Hawk's Nest's hours of operation are for consideration," said Maimone.

Another big change will be installing big validators in all of the Coca-Cola and Pepsi drink machines. Also this fall, students will be able to use their I.D. plus cards at the library in Westside Hall, and at any copying machines in Randall Library. Maimone added, "We are also working with our laundry contract in an attempt to place I.D. Plus validators on laundry machines in the suites, apartments and Schwartz Hall.

There are many expensive changes that will be made for the fall semester, but Maimone assures students that "all renovations are self-supported by Auxiliary Services vending, so it will not affect students' tuition and fee cost." However, what is most important is that Auxiliary Services vending contributes to scholarship money for students.

Campus Station Off Air For Summer

BY ROBIN TISINGER
Staff Writer

Wilmington's college radio station, WLOZ, will be off the air from May 15 to July 15, according to station manager Robbyn Marchall.

Marchall said the station will shut down to reorganize and update some equipment. "The summer is a good time to do it because a lot of the staff and DJs go home then, anyway," said Marchall.

WLOZ was shut down last summer as well, amid charges of drug use while the station was on the air.

Recently elected to the SGA, Marchall said the station's image is changing.

"We want everyone to know that we are not a group of elites," she said.

More mainstream student are getting involved with WLOZ. Participation from non-traditional students has increased also, Marchall said.

The station features a variety of music not found on any local FM stations. In addition to the usual Alternative/Progressive bands, WLOZ features world music, Jazz, Blues, Greek, African, New Vogue and Reggae.

Most this music comes from local and student bands like "Cop Shoot Cop" and "Emily's Porch."

There have been problems with funding. Last year the SGA cut funds to the Media Board. WLOZ's budget was cut in half. All paid positions were cut and repairs and improvements on equipment had to be put off.

Currently, all of the stations 67 DJ's and staff members are volunteer, full-time students.

WLOZ now has a consistent outlet. The Hawk's Nest has the station piped in Wednesday and Friday from 7:30 a.m. - 3p.m.

This identifiable, consistent audience could spark the interest of underwriters, hoping to attract students' business. Area clubs, surf shops, and record stores buy advertising from the station. This would mean more funds for WLOZ and less dependence on the SGA and Media Board for support.

Marchall said she hopes an underwriter program will be implemented this fall.

WLOZ's hours of operation are the same as the student union's (7a.m.-11p.m.). But Marchall said the goal is to restore the station's old hours by fall.

Intramural Sports

The Intramural Sport Awards for the 1992-93 season are in and the winners are the Kappa Alpha Order and Alpha Phi. The awards are based on sportmanship, participation, organization, respect and team spirit. Congratulations to both these fine organizations.

Indoor soccer action is well into the schedule and we have seen our share of excitement. To start, PSG scored a 9-6 victory over AC Milan in the White league. Other action saw Team Adidas explode for a UNCW indoor record of 15 goals, on their way to a 15-5 waxing of Delta Sig B.

Softball action is going smoothly with all league standings closely contested. Graham Party Time scored a thrilling 10-9 victory over the Slammers in the Blue league. The Fraternity division proved Delta Sig a winner over the Phi Kappas 9-7.

The Men's Intramural Tennis tournament final will feature Ron Sealy vs. Mike Abernathy. The women's field has been narrowed to the "Final Four". Prizes for the winners were donated by Tennis With Love. Good luck to all participants involved!!

Club Sports

UNCW's sports clubs were very active these past two weeks and as the semester rolls down many of your fellow students will be representing UNCW in various regional and national club events.

The Women's Ultimate team traveled to Fredericksburg, VA for the 12th annual April Fools Tourney on April 2nd-4th. The SeaWeed competed against strong club teams, yet still made a good showing and came 3 points from advancing to the finals. Outstanding endzone play from 2nd year player, Janice Robby, contributed to UNCW's success. Over Easter weekend, UNCW hosted another Ultimate tournament. The SeaWeed placed 2nd while the SeaMen fought thru many strong club teams to advance to the semis. Home team, Port City Slickers, comprised mostly of X-seamen, and advanced to the finals yet lost to Raleigh's club team.

The Crew team has attended events these past two weekends. One, a preparatory event in Durham and another, a USRA event in Clemson, SC which featured 7 teams from the southeast. UNCW's heavyweight boat finished 4th and a Wilmington-UNC combo varsity eight boat finished 3rd.

The Sailing club will host the 1st Annual Single Handed Regatta at Wrightsville Beach this Saturday. The LaCrosse team will be hosting UNCW's 1st LaCrosse tournament. The Coastal Carolina LaCrosse Invitational will feature 16 teams from the east coast and will be going on all weekend at Brooks field. Come out and support UNCW's laxmen.

Two weeks ago, the Women's Soccer team crushed ECU in a home game 4 to 0. This Sunday, they will be competing in another home game against NC State.

Challenge "Ropes" Course Student Staff

The UNCW Challenge "Ropes" Course student facilitator staff is made up of twelve dedicated individuals that are committed to providing educational and meaningful programs for the UNCW community. The type of programs that these peer leaders provide gives students, faculty, and staff an opportunity to strengthen the community, practice effective leadership, communication, and decision-making skills. Only in their first year of service, the UNCW Challenge "Ropes" Course Facilitators have worked with over 30 groups from UNCW.

Challenge "Ropes" Courses are innovative and exciting programs. This type of program requires facilitators not only to have good communication and facilitation skills, but to have knowledge of the technical equipment used for safety to participants and for course operation. All of these skills make up the leadership characteristics of the UNCW Challenge "Ropes" Course Facilitators. To become effective and safe challenge course leaders these students are required to complete in depth training that consists of 24 hours of "on the course" training, basic first aid and CPR certifications, apprentice days, and weekly staff meetings.

The UNCW Challenge "Ropes" Course Facilitators have a true commitment to their own leadership development, and to helping others explore and practice leadership as well. These students are excellent examples of leaders of a new generation, enhancing the more traditional definitions of leadership by demonstrating a holistic approach to being a leader. Fast. Not FAT Fast food is a fact of life. It is convenient, moderately priced, and readily available. However, it's often overly salted, loaded with fat, and high in calories. You don't have to give up fast foods all together in order to eat right. But, when you do go out for fast food, use this guide to help make healthy selections. The average, healthy adult should eat no more than 30% of his or her daily calories in fat (there are 9 calories in one gram of fat) and no more than 3,300 milligrams of sodium per day.

Although selections vary from one fast food restaurant to the next, the guidelines for choosing healthy, nutritious meals remain the same.

AVOID deep-fried foods (french fries, onion rings, etc.) which are high in fat and calories. Added fats, sauces, mayonnaise, toppings - should be restricted. Soft drinks are high in calories and low in nutrients, so use them moderately.

CHOOSE broiled or baked meat or poultry over fried sandwiches. Fresh side salads (with reduced calorie dressings) are a low-calorie alternative to fries. For a beverage, opt for low-fat milk or the perfect refresher - WATER.

EXAMPLES OF THE BEST CHOICES AT FAST FOOD RESTAURANTS

Burger King: Chicken Tender: 10 fat g.; 204 cals
Cheeseburger: 15 fat g.; 317 cals

McDonald's: Hamburger: 11 fat g.; 263 cals
Cheeseburger: 16 fat g.; 318 cals

Wendy's: Baked Potato: 2 fat g.; 250 cals
Chick. Sandwich: 10 fat g.; 320 c.

All-Stars Coming to Wilmington

BY KATIE FAIRCLOTH
Sports Writer

For the 15th consecutive year, Sugar Creek Enterprises, Inc. will showcase some of the country's top collegiate basketball talent at Trask Coliseum on April 23. This will be the fifth time UNCW has hosted this event. The main attraction will be Duke's Bobby Hurley who heads a list of top-flight players scheduled to compete. Hurley, a 6-0 point guard out of Jersey City, NJ, became the NCAA's all-time assist leader this season, surpassing the record held by N.C. State's Chris Corchiani. It was Hurley that led the Blue Devils to NCAA titles in 1991 and 1992. For the annual ACC All-Star Classic Circuit game, Hurley will be joined by several other outstanding seniors from the ACC. They are Henrik Rodl, Scott Cherry, and Matt Westrom of UNC, Kevin Thompson of, and Dominic Seal of N.C. State, Derek Hicks of Wake Forest and David Rasmussen also of Wake Forest. In addition, three UNC-Wilmington players will appear in the game. After sparking the Seahawks to a 17-11 record in 1992-93, seniors Tim Shaw, Keith Adkins and Reggie Vency are slated to suit up for the contest. Two other players are making a special appearance. Antonio Harvey, from Pfeiffer College and NAIA All-American, has agreed to play along with Tommy Kane, a Wilmington native. "We're very pleased to have another outstanding group coming to Wilmington," says Neil McGeachy, president of Sugar Creek Enterprises. "Bobby Hurley certainly has become one of the elite players in the country over the last four years."

The game schedule has Hurley conducting an autograph session at the Omega Sports University Center Store from 4-5 p.m. on April 23. Hurley will also be conducting a pre-game clinic at 6:30 p.m. The game tips off at 7:30 p.m. and during half-time, as in the past, a three-point shooting contest and slam dunk contest will be staged. Following the game, an extensive court side autograph session is scheduled.

Tickets are currently on sale at both Omega Sports locations. Tickets will be $8 in advance and $10 at the door, the box office at Trask Coliseum will open at 6 p.m. on game day.

UNCW Squad Places Second in Nation

BY JULIE PODLASEK
Staff Writer

Last week, UNCW's varsity cheerleaders came in second place in the national competition sponsored by the Universal Cheerleaders Association (UCA).

The competition was held in San Diego, California at nearby Sea World, with three divisions competing. This is the fifth year UNCW has made it to the national competition with previous rankings in third, fourth and fifth place.

UCA is the largest cheerleading company in the United States, as well as several other countries. They sponsor cheerleading camps all over the country and also in Japan, who has a national championship team similar to ours. The three divisions include Division I-A which is for the largest schools, Divisions I which UNCW competes in, and Division II, for smaller institutions.

Eight schools were chosen out of 33 from previous video tapes sent in by each college squads. At Nationals, UNCW competed against Bradley University, James Madison, Georgia Southern, UNC-Charlotte (fourth), George Mason (third), and Morehead State University, who came in first.

Captain James Harkey commented, "One thing that made us have an edge over the others was that parts of our routine were not as technical as other teams, but they were very visual and fun to watch. We are very lucky to have a coach who has the ability to make up a routine that was so unusual, and really exciting to see."

UNCW impressed UCA with their video tape and placed second in the taping, which included travel expenses to California, and room and board once they were there. The Student Government Association helped support them financially, the Athletic Department gave them money for meals and rental vans, and Wal-Mart donated the $424 the cheerleaders made at a car wash to pay for three other members to go.

Harkey explained, "I was excited to do so well since this was my senior year. I wanted to do better than we've ever done before, and this was as close as we've come to winning. I was really happy that we were able to hold our own against the bigger schools who are able to recruit athletes because of the financial support that they have. In North Carolina there's not enough funding for schools to give cheerleaders money for scholarships, so I was excited that we came in second place. Especially since 7 out of 14 cheerleaders were new members of the squad and have never been to nationals. We are very lucky that they were all so extremely talented."

Captain Staci Cummings and Lisa Forbes have been to Nationals for the past four years. Forbes expressed, "Being a senior and going the last four years was a lot of fun, but this squad was the most enjoyable squad to be on in all my years at this school. And I know next year they're going to go back and get first place!"

At the end of the competition, UCA threw a party for all the divisions of cheerleaders and dance teams that were there. They were lucky enough to meet Mario Lopez, who plays "macho" A.C. Slater on Save By the Bell, who joined them at the events. Besides that, to help add to the excitement of the trip were the exquisite cabanas they stayed in at the San Diego Princess resort, on Mission Bay, affiliated with Princess Cruise Lines.

The national competition is one that gives schools a lot of publicity and recognition for their talents. One of the cheerleaders, Reggie Ingram, who is originally from San Diego, transferred here to become a part of UNCW's squad. He heard of their talents through their accomplishments at past national competitions. One thing that adds to the publicity of the event is that it is shown on ESPN throughout the whole year. The ESPN spokesman announced this competition receives the most viewing worldwide than any other special event. Its first airing date this year will be June 4.

Tryouts for next year's varsity squad will take place in Trask Coliseum at 7:00. For more info contact James Harkey at 350-5061. Congratulations cheerleaders!

UNCW School of Business Becomes Accredited

BY HOLLY PRICE
News Editor

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington's Cameron School of Business has joined the ranks of the elite.

University officials announced Wednesday that the business school had been accredited by the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business. UNCW joins Duke University, UNC-Chapel Hill, Wake Forest, and six other North Carolina schools of business. Only 20 percent of the country's business schools hold this honor.

"This is a great opportunity and challenge for the students in the business school," said Chancellor James Leutze.

Former Dean of Cameron School of Business, Norman Kaylor attributes the accreditation to the fine work of not only the faculty, but the students as well.

"This doesn't mean we are getting an award for something we will do, but something the faculty and students have already done," he said.

The business school made a bid for accreditation a year ago and failed. This was due to too few professors with doctorates and a deficiency in the quality and quantity of faculty research.

This year's bid was met with close scrutiny on Cameron's faculty, admissions, curriculum, and degree requirements as well as the facilities available to students. Over the last several years these things have been upgraded and improved.

In January, Cameron selected a new dean, Dr. Howard Rockness. Some of the credit for this honor is being placed with Dr. Rockness, said Dr. Leutze.

"He has brought great prestige to the program," said Dr. Leutze.

Dr., Rockness, 47, former associate dean of the MBA program at UNC-Chapel Hill, will assume his new position July 1.

Commencement Ceremony May 15

BY CAROLE MEHLE
Staff Writer

Just ask any senior what May 15 is and you'll get a quick answer: Graduation day.

During Commencement ceremonies at Trask Coliseum, 888 graduates will be honored. Dr. John Hope Franklin, commencement speaker, will receive an honorary doctor of letters to honor him as one of the most respected historians in the nation. Dr. Franklin, a retired James B. Duke Professor of History at Duke University, continues teaching in Duke's law school.

Candidates for graduation have already been notified, but will be confirmed before May 15. Candidates were required to apply last semester and received notification of acceptance during Christmas break.

The process of determining qualified graduates begins with the applications, which are evaluated through a degree audit conducted by the Registrar's Office, Paula Greene of the Registrar's Office said. The applications are then sent to departments for evaluation. If a candidate does not meet degree requirements, for example, failure of a class or a lower grade point average than required, the student is notified by the department prior to graduation.

When the candidate makes it past those hurdles, the next hurdle is Commencement itself. Students are required to wear regalia for the exercises. The regalia consists of the traditional cap and gown, which will be available at the University Bookstore, Trailer One beginning May 3.

When students pick up their regalia, they also must pick up tickets allowing them five guests at Trask. This number was devised by determining the number of available seats in the coliseum divided by the number of anticipated graduates. Students who are not participating in exercises at Trask can give their tickets away.

Bookstore officials said if students need extra tickets, it is best to get them on their own.

In the event there are any unclaimed tickets, they will be available at the ticket booth in Trask.

Tickets are not needed to attend the receptions within the departments, where the degrees will actually be conferred. Because the final grades will be in by graduation, students will receive their actual diplomas at the ceremonies.

The schedule for Commencement is as follows: 9:15 a.m.: Graduates prepare for processional in Hanover Hall 10:00 a.m.: Academic processional begins in Trask 10:00 a.m.-12 noon: Commencement Exercises

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

For years African-Americans have lived their lives reacting to all of the things that were done to them; the NAACP wanted blacks to become more proactive, not reactive. The national vice president of NAACP, Kelley Alexander Jr., has been involved in this ongoing effort since the age of nine.

The NAACP did not become involved in economics until the Carter administration. The first economic development was the economic committee. The purpose of this committee was the train NAACP units on economics, and develop the capacity to do something different. As a result, NAACP created the Fair Share program, which gave NAACP a fair share of contribution from various corporations. Since the Carter administration, NAACP's Fair Share program has developed vending and purchasing relationships with over seventy major corporations, such as Hardee's, Kroger, United Airlines and Nations Bank.

Alexander claimed that since blacks may not attend the right school, or play golf with the right people, we have to develop other ways to interface with corporate America. Mr. Alexander is president of the North Carolina State Conference of Branches, and a member of distinguished alumni organization at UNC-Chapel Hill, where he received a bachelor of arts degree in Political Science and a masters in Public Administration. Alexander is also president of Alexander Funeral Home, Inc. in Charlotte, N.C., where he is responsible for marketing, financial planning, research and development. The aforementioned background enable Alexander to negotiate an agreement with Nations Bank to contribute one billion dollars a year for ten years to minority lending. In addition, Nations Banks has contributed to NAACP, enabling NAACP to

Be one of the first to get an official Seahawk license plate

Here's your chance to sport the Seahawk logo and support the UNCW Alumni Association. For the same cost as a personalized plate, you can honor the Seahawks by owning an official Seahawk license plate.

In addition to the regular annual motor vehicle registration fee of $20, pay only $25 annually for the UNCW license plate. Fifteen dollars of that money comes back to the university.

UNCW must send the names of 300 people interested in purchasing (but not obligated to buy) license plates to the Department of Motor Vehicles. Once the DMV has 300 names, they will commit to making the tags and will send each person who signed up an application for a UNCW license plate.

If you are interested in signing up, stop by the Alumni Office, Alderman Hall Room 108, or call Barbie Cowan at (919) 395-3004.

Stay In Touch With The Beauty

It breaks my heart. The stories and picture of children of Bosnia/Herzegovina with arms and legs blown away; similar stories and pictures of bloated bellies and all too visible rib cages bespeaking intense hunger from Somalia; all this breaks my heart. I must be naive or idealistic, or both, for I simply cannot understand how adult human beings can be caught up in such intense hatreds as to perpetrate these horrors on their children. I know that adults suffer as much. I know the stories of rapes and brutalities on women, the mortar fire on families burying family members; but it's the children who seem to symbolize for me the worst of this.

And yet I am very much aware how incredibly blessed I am personally and how much joy as well as peace and pleasure there is in my life. By no particular merit of my own, I and so many of us have been born into families and a society at the level that is filled with hope and possibilities.

All of us have problems and we spend an awful lot of time being anxious, worrying and trying to figure out how to handle what life brings our way; most of us know something of a consistent kind of love that comes from family and friends and God that provides an incredibly strong foundation so that even storms of life may shake our structure, we have this all important faith that we will survive.

The juxtaposition of these two awarenesses—the anguish of the world's children and the gracefulness of our lives—is not meant to lead us into a guilt trip. Rather, I found myself feeling both incredibly thankful for the goodness of my life and challenged to figure out what the focus of my loving of others need to be.

As spring is bursting upon us, I would like to invite us all to stay in touch to the beauty around us and within us and the thankfulness that it calls forth. I would like to invite us also to stay in touch with the anguish of people who have no hope or possibilities; who are victims whose lives are being absolutely wiped out and to let that anguish lead us to one focused act of loving others not only for their sakes, not only because justice and love demands it, but for our own sakes as well. Finding some specific way to care for others is the only effective antidote to the kind of self-centeredness encouraged by our cultures values, a self-centeredness that winds up taking the life out of all the things that should bring us joy.

Martin Luther King, Jr. said it so very well, "In order to live creatively and meaningfully, self concern must be wedded to concern for theirs." Where does the anguish you feel for the suffering of so many in our world lead you to be in active service?

who interprets the Word to live contrary to God's standards. It is not so much the brazen homosexuals that I am concerned about, nor is it fundamental evangelical Christians. I am concerned about the ones in-between, on the fence, who don't know who is right. That probably includes everyone who will read this article.

This paper might be not be a forum for religious views but it can definitely have opposing views. That shows decency. Will the voice of Truth be heard among the roar of the masses? No, God does not hate homosexuals. No, Christians don't hate homosexuals either, period, case closed. By very definition a Christian is one who is like Christ. He loves his neighbor. We may not like their practices but with the help of Jesus we can radiate the love of Christ. I know Jeffrey B. Becker personally. I recently told Jeff something that may shock you. I asked him if he knew that I loved him. "Yes, I know that," was his answer.

I am a born again Christian; I know the Lord; I know Jesus Christ personally. I also told Jeff this, I can accept you, but I can't accept the lifestyle. But Romans 8:1-9 say that there is hope for the homosexual. If he accepts Christ he is free from the carnality of the flesh to live in the life of the Spirit of Jesus. What a blessed promise!

Editor: Our campus was recently the site of a most amazing event! On March 16, over 350 students, members of the faculty and staff, family members an individuals from the Wilmington community came together on our campus to form the "Take Back the Night" march and rally.

Their numbers included African-Americans, children, fraternity brothers, gays, senior citizens, sorority sisters, men, straights, survivors of abuse, women and many others. For all their differences, they came together as one to deliver the message "sexual abuse must end."

I want to offer to each of those people heartfelt "thank you." Your participation in "Take Back the Night" was critical in helping us to build at UNCW a community in which sexual violence is not tolerated. By your presence, you reached out to survivors of sexual violence and told them that you support them in their recovery.

A second important group needs to be recognized—the dedicated and hard-working individuals who made the rally and march possible. They are they ones who laid the plans, prepared all the signs, made phone calls, worked with University police, arranged for donations of food and drinks and much, much more. They are the march student-coordinators Kim Timmons and Lisa Picklesimer and many others who we thanked in a recent Seahawk ad. Without Kim and Lisa's commitment to the project it could not have been so very successful. Also deserving of special thanks are Peggy Thompson and Vickie Stanley. These four students were with the project from the beginning and were major driving force in making the event happen. They displayed tremendous dedication to both the project and to ending sexual violence.

Finally, one of the great successes of this event was that it was the product of a coalition of individuals and organization from both on- and off-campus. I believe it was the involvement of such a cross-section of people that made the march and rally special. It truly was a "coming together."

The recent ad in The Seahawk on March 25 named individuals and groups involved making the march and rally happen. Again, thanks to them and all who participated. The "Take Back the Night" march and rally was truly a community effort. We each need to keep that special spirit of the march and rally if we are to stop the violence. So, to each of you who was there for "Take Back the Night" in body or in spirit, keep your candle burning and work together with us to end sexual violence and to truly "Reclaim the Right to Live Without Fear."

Hope to see you at the Wilmington march in the fall of '93 and at the next UNCW march in the spring of '94!

Diane Edwards, Rally Coordinator

UNCW Nursing School Students Deserve Better

The nursing students of UNCW have been given a raw deal and if nothing is done to right this injustice, the school will receive a black eye no money from donors or having another school accredited can cure.

Many UNCW nursing students were not accepted into the Nursing School after spending two years here. Several students were advised to not seek a degree elsewhere because their grades were good enough to get accepted into the UNCW School of Nursing after completing the two-year pre-nursing program. Students from other colleges, some with a quality of education below that of UNCW, were accepted. The problem lies not with being unqualified, but with the students not accepted not having any options to continue their quest for a nursing degree.

Adriane Barringer and Alison Ferguson have organized a protest of the School of Nursing's handling of their and other college students' college experience.

In a five page letter to the trustees and chancellor, 50 students, so far, have expressed their extreme displeasure at the way Dean Mariene M. Rosenkoetter has run her department.

A couple of graduating nursing students said Dean Rosenkoetter told students to cancel job interviews so they could attend a "command performance", and if they didn't show, their grade would be affected. Rosenkoetter promptly left the event after the beginning of the show.

Dean Rosenkoetter is also accused of calling an area hospital and telling the hospital to reschedule all UNCW student interviews.

Dean Rosenkoetter has also been accused of having interviews grade subjective tests the dean is supposed to grade.

Whenever students deal over 20 grievances, someone in the administration needs to listen and listen closely. The students feel the dean's office is unsympathetic to their pleas and will not give them the time of day to discuss the issues they want to address.

This is a substantial list of grievances that must be addressed.

Why?

Doesn't the dean know who pays her salary? It is the students of UNCW, not those of other schools. Dean Rosenkoetter needs to meet with the students and to reevaluate her department. The Chancellor and other school officials also need to analyze this department. If the grievances prove true and little is done to rectify the situation, what faith can all the students of UNCW place in the administration.

The School of Nursing is one of the bright spots of this institution. But an incident like this, if it is not quickly righted, will tarnish the School of Nursing and UNCW.

The Seahawk tried to interview Dean Rosenkoetter about this issue, but the staff writer was told there wasn't time for an interview and to talk to someone else in the office about the issue.

SGA Executive Office Hours are Important

On Tuesday, Student Government Association President Ziggy Nix vetoed a resolution passed unanimously by the Senate that would require him to maintain at least 15 office hours a week and a minimum of 60 office hours a month.

The students of UNCW deserve an individual who will give 15 hours a week of himself to the student body. These hours, however, should not be limited to those spent within the confines of the SGA office, room 200 in the Union. The hours spent meeting with the chancellor and other school officials, representing the school at various functions, and performing duties required of the president should also be taken into consideration.

The resolution approved by the Senate is not unreasonable. It states that the 1993-94 Executive Budget included salaries and hour requirements for executive positions, the Senate would be responsible for keeping up with the office hours of executive officials, and that no current check and balance system currently exists.

There needs to be a system by which the hours the executive officials perform their duties outside the office are included in the "office hours" total, but executive officials must be available in their offices at least ten hours a week, and those hours must be regularly scheduled ones.

The Seahawk wishes to thank all who made this year fun

With this final editorial of the school year, the staff here would like to sincerely thank all individuals who helped us put this newspaper together.

Without the support of school officials, the Public Relations Office, the Sports Information Office, the campus office administrators who fielded questions, arranged appointments, returned phone call, and smiled throughout our visits, we could not have accomplished what we did this year. We thank you so much.

We feel we did a good job converting from a weekly newspaper that covered world issues to one whose main concern was UNCW. As most of you know, not a lot goes on around here, so some issues were lean on stories and often resembled ad-packs.

We would also like to especially thank the people who answered phone calls and questions on April 1-5. There were reports of over 100 calls concerning the Braves-Red Sox game, and nearly as many for the James Taylor concert. To those people, we sincerely appreciate your cooperation and good naturedness.

To those people who disagreed with positions this newspaper took on issues, we feel we left the door wide open for you to express your views in this newspaper.

The entire staff here at The Seahawk wishes to thank all the people who make this year fun and an enjoyable learning experience.

Response to Stephen Eastman

This letter is in response to Stephen Eastman's "BS,BS,BS" that appeared in last week's Seahawk. Stephen, I find it hard to believe that anyone in a position of authority at the Division of Public Service would say "we have decided to hire an all girl staff this year." If someone did in fact say this, it is possible that you took this statement out of context?

I have had dealings with this office in the past and the staff has never been anything but professional. A statement such as this would be very out of character for them. I feel there must be much more to this story than the surface information you have provided.

In positions that deal with children in an educational environment, employers must screen all applicants thoroughly. Could it be that there may have been someone more qualified for the job who just happened to be female? Or could your performance as assistant director last year have been less than satisfactory?

Your bitter feelings were evident in your letter. If I had a young child, I would not leave them in care of someone with such obvious lack of self control and patience. If the letter sent to the Chancellor and others was as hostile as the one in the paper (and I'm sure it was) it is no wonder they have been slow to respond; you are obviously a troubled individual.

Center Stage Cafe Is Worth Saving

I heard about the Center Stage/Classroom conversion through the grapevine. As a long-time employee of ARA services, in catering and Center Stage, as well as a University Center Building Manager, I've seen first hand how much our UNCW family make use of the Center Stage.

The Cafe is a unique and flexible part of our campus. It is the only place where dining and entertainment are combined with some semblance of atmosphere, as well as the option of dining outdoors. You cannot find this anywhere else on campus. Performers regularly play for sober audiences, day and night. This offers our student musicians much needed live exposure, and cafe patrons enjoy it as well.

The wide screen TV is another part of Center Stage you can't find anywhere else. Occasional movies and a channel changer makes dining there more relaxing. The turnout during lunch hours is substantial enough for me to wonder where all these people will go if yet another dining option is denied its full potential. The Hawk's Nest has already cut off dinner hours. Will Wagoner Hall be the only outpost for all meals?

I would have thought that here at UNCW, more options would be explored, with such an accommodating area such as Center Stage. We are NOT an all-or-nothing system who will sacrifice individualism and student life for money without exploring the many possibilities for positive change. The University Center is

Concerning Article on Gay Rights

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending His own in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Romans 8:1-9.

How does this apply to today? When people such as Jeffrey B. Becker write articles, the likes of which appeared in last week's Seahawk, much confusion takes place concerning the issues of homosexuality and morality.

True, the Bible has been misused and misrepresented to support ungodly philosophies, but there is a right way to use the Bible. God has given me an ultimatum concerning last week's article, to set apart Truth from the interpretations that are misused by someone who doesn't even know the God of the Bible, and further,

Columnist Phil Smith's U-rine Review 1992-93

Wacko, Texas-- In a freak event earlier this week, FBI agents switched tactics in their efforts to oust cult leader David Koresh and his followers from their humble abode.

Officers reportedly rammed a 1986 General Motors pick up truck into the side of the building which, upon impact, burst into flames and soon engulfed the entire compound. The majority of the cult members have not been located yet and are thought to be holed up in a local coffee shop. "Yes friends, it's a weird, wild, wacky world we live in."

I can't spend too much time on small talk this week because I have bigger and better things to do. And now without further ado, or doo-doo if you will, I present for your reading enjoyment, "The way I saw it," by NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith.

August 20, 1992--Some eight thousand students returned to Seahawk High only to learn that their beloved Seahawk mascot had been killed in a freak hunting accident. The mascot was quickly replaced by a "bolder and more fearsome" mascot. Phil Smith announces in his column that he had an interesting summer and promises to write about it soon.

September 3, 1992--Phil reports on the Star Trek convention which invaded the UNCW campus that weekend. The report included a "band of Klingon Warrior looking things that later turned out to be campus cops working stealth." Also included in this issue was a description of how Phil came home and found soap suds "coming out from under the front door" courtesy of two new roommates who put regular dish washing liquid in the dishwasher.

September 7, 1992--Phil ponders the question "Would Rusty eat the evidence?" in announcing his plan to have the KFC vs. Hardee's chicken controversy solved on The People's Court. Some readers, anxious for the "How I Spent My Summer" issue begin to wonder if it would ever be written. Politics heat up as Clinton announces that he did not inhale; Bush says Clinton belongs in jail, and Ross Perot says our country's going to "well, you know."

October 1, 1992--In a Barbara Walter's special entitled "Woss Puwo: The Man, The Miff, The Weggend," Texas bizillionaire H. Ross Perot announced he was getting back into the Presidential race. In campus news, students in a Bio 105 class were alleged to have cheated on a final exam. In a massive closet clean-out, Phil announces that he was once accused of cheating on an Advanced Basket Weaving final but he insisted that "they never proved my grandmother made that basket."

October 15, 1992--In his report on the presidential debates, Phil quotes then Gov. Clinton as saying to then Pres. Bush, "I knew George Washington, I was a friend of George Washington's, and you Mr. Bush, are no George Washington." NoBull columnist Phil Smith announces his candidacy for President on the famous "NoBull Platform."

The Shoes Off award this week was awarded to the (Ex-) girlfriend of semi-coherent reader Rob Ley. She had dumped on him and I was doing my civic duty to say "That stinks." (Columnist note: They are now back together and engaged. Am I great, or what?)

November 12, 1992--In his post election issues Phil announces "it's over; the fat lady has sung." He (Isn't it odd that I kept referring to myself as "he"?) Perhaps I'm a bit anal-retentive.) reported that thousands of UNCW students lined up to vote, mistakenly thinking they were in line to register for classes. Still no "How I Spent My Summer" issue.

November 19, 1992--At last, after stringing impatient readers out for nearly three months, Phil finally offers the summer issue. He described in detail how he applied for and got a job at "Quality Analytical Services" and revealed that he had more than likely tested the birth control pills issued at the UNCW STD (Health and Wellness) Center. There was also mention of a trip to New York on local airline, US-Scare.

December 3, 1992--In a last issue for the Fall '92 semester, the highlight is a story about the disgusting "Magic Potty Baby" that will undoubtedly be the most sought after gift for Christmas. Speaking of Christmas, Phil offers his "Six Days of Christmas" which terminates with, "on the sixth day of Christmas, UNCW gave to me six failing grades, FIVE LESS SPEED BUMPS, four rental cops, three parking tickets, two high-priced textbooks, and a Seahawk in a pit cre." January 14, 1993--This week Phil offered readers Phil Smith "Home (but not Alone)" For The Holidays." The highlight of the column was the now infamous line from Mom, "Do you want some Ho-Cake Phil?" Phil also mentions a holiday ski trip and questions the certification of Ski-Lift operators. In other news, the UNCW men's basketball team posted its best start "since the fall of Rome" with an 8-2 mark.

January 28, 1993--In this post-inaugural issue, the highlight was a story explaining how Phil missed the actual swearing in because "just as Clinton reached for the Bible, a gust of wind came through and Chelsea's hair went everywhere, and the next thing I knew there was Fleetwood Mac singing "Don't Stop Thinking About Tomorrow." Phil also reports having to go to Rental Cop central, where he was "exposed to arch nemesis and desk officer Lisa Kellogg. (Columnist note: Readers must have been following the Phil vs. Lisa saga for the whole two years to get the full meaning of this.)

February 4, 1993--Scientists announce that they have discovered "prehistoric rat urine" which could answer some questions about our universe. Phil ponders the thought of having his own toilet scrapings analyzed millions of years from now by future scientists. Phil proposes that the 45 reason for throwing toilet paper at a Seahawk basketball game is "Celebrating the end of a FIVE week long bout with diarrhea."

February 18, 1993--Phil announces his upcoming birthday, in anticipation of gifts that never come. The highlight of the issues was the explanation that his birthday is on leap year day because his mom "similar to breaking wind, could not hold Phil in any longer." They always said I was a little fart.

March 11, 1993--After a deserved spring break and journalistic hiatus, Phil's top story is about a Branch Davidson cult in Waco, Texas. Phil ponders the question, "Could this happen at Alderman Hall?" Phil's fears are relaxed when he learns from the Chancellor that he has no plans to form any "Branch Leutizian" cult.

March 25, 1993--In another NoBull Prize winning column, Phil reports seeing a campus speed reduction device which proclaims "Your Speed is ____." Phil ponders the idea of a campus cop weight reduction device, which proclaims in return, "Your waistline is ____."

In other news, the Audubon Society offers a $500 reward for Vice President Al Gore, who hasn't been seen for weeks. April 1, 1993--The Seahawk pulls one over on many students who mistakenly believe several items in this April Fool's issue. Some still think President Clinton spoke on the front lawn of the Union, and then had lunch with the Chancellor at McDonalds. Phil offers a NoBull Prize winning Top Five Reasons to Enjoy Driving in Wilmington, but semi-coherent readers were shocked to learn the issue would be his last.

April 15, 1993--Giving in to guilt and to the first two fan letters (besides the ones from Mom) of his career, Phil announces that he will in fact be writing for one more year. Phil also announces that he, along with his dog, have been named finalists in the Publishers Clearing House sweepstakes. The relevance of the Honey Baked Ham at Easter holiday was questioned and it was concluded that there was in fact no ham at the Last Supper.

April 22, 1993--Phil makes a feeble attempt at reviewing the highlights from columns past. Top news stories included the "How Phil Spent Summer" issue, the presidential election (including the Ross Perot "I'm all ears" incident), Magic Potty Baby, Geological rat urine, the Ho-cake episode, several "campus cops moments", and the Branch Leutizian Cult takeover of Alderman Hall.

He had some "ugly stuff" this week about the recent arrest of a beloved campus rental officer patrol unit. But, considering the fine performance by the officers at the recent "Dunk a Cop for Special Olympics" he has decided not to. Besides, Phil dunked several officers without their knowing who he was, and they even offered him a complimentary Krispy Kreme Donut. (If I were offering Hats Off this week they may have been the recipients.)

April 28, 1993--Confused, but semi-coherent readers rush to campus newstands to grab a copy of The Seahawk. It is not until they reach this point that they realize they have re-read this column (having forgotten everything in it). May 8, 1993--Phil, having completed final exams, is stopped for a routine license check as he leaves campus. He is immediately identified and arrested for "impersonating a newspaper columnist and hauled off to the campus jail. But not to worry, he will surely decide a plan, perhaps involving more Krispy Kreme donuts, to escape and continue his journalistic escapades for another year.

Have a safe and enjoyable summer. Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is regular columnist to The Seahawk, and will be back next year, barring any campus police incidents.

Where To Sell Your Books

BY AMY BRENNAN
Staff Writer

The end of a semester means different things to different students. For some it means graduation and hunting for a "real" job. For others it means the opportunity to sell back textbooks and get MONEY!

The question on everyone's mind right now is not "I wonder if I will pass that physics final?" but, "Are they going to try to cram us all into those tiny trailers they call a bookstore?"

Relax! Book buy-back will begin on April 29 in room 100 of the University Union. For those of you who DIDN'T EVEN REALIZE (!) the bookstore had moved (What trailers?), here is a quick catch-up.

The bookstore originally in Hinton James along with the Student Union. Then it moved to a metal building that stood where the planter outside of the Burney Student Support Center now stands. In 1985, the Burney Student Support Center was built specifically for the bookstore. Now the bookstore is located in temporary trailers next to the Center. The bookstore is expected to move back into Burney by the end of May. Got it?

Why all the changes? No, they were not done to confuse you. Arnold Siko, the bookstore manager says the bookstore originally did not need all the space that it now requires, because the student enrollment was less then.

With increased enrollment and older equipment the bookstore was not as efficient as it should have been. Before renovations took place, it was possible to stand in line for hours just to buy books at the beginning of the semester.

Siko says the primary goal of the renovated bookstore will be to offer better service. Scanners like those used in grocery stores have been implemented to read bar codes on items. This should speed the check-out process as well as make it more efficient.

The first thought to cross many of our minds are probably going to be, "Does this mean the price of books is going to go up?" Again, relax. Book prices are not going up because of all the renovations.

"Book prices are set by the publisher and the bookstore marks them up at a rate the covers freight and other handling charges," Mr. Siko said.

The manager is sympathetic to students over the high cost of books. The bookstore receives no state funding for its operation. Many people are surprised to learn that, "Siko said. The bookstore will continue to operate out of the trailers through the first summer session. Siko does not believe that this will be a problem since the enrollment during the summer is less then the rest of the year.

Construction delays had already pushed back the completion date several times.

Incoming Freshmen Needs Your Help

BY JOHN BRYAN
Staff Writer

Little Seahawks need you! The SGA and the Office of Enrollment Management are beginning "The Little Seahawk" program and they need students.

"Big Seahawks," to make it work. The Little Seahawk Program is a program designed to ease the transition into college life for entering freshmen. The program works by matching up veteran UNCW students with incoming freshmen. Big Seahawks will then help the new freshman to learn the ropes--showing them around campus, introducing them to others, etc.

Sophomore Phil Feiner, who heads the committee in charge of this program, is excited about what it can accomplish. "I see it as a way to get freshman interested and involved in the campus community," he said. In echoing his concern for involvement in the community Feiner commented, "It's also a great way for campus organizations to recruit new members." He anticipates organizations will support this program and will encourage members to volunteer. Feiner notes that many organizations are experiencing recruitment problems. He believes that campus organizations such as clubs, fraternities and sororities, athletic clubs, etc., "are the key to the campus community."

Another goal The Little Seahawk Program hopes to achieve is to increase freshman retention rates. Feiner believes that many freshmen do not return to school because they feel as if they don't belong.

Volunteers will meet their Little Seahawks at a party to be held during the last week of orientation or the first week of classes, according to Feiner. Students matched up for the program will also be able to call each other before classes begin. "The program encourages friendship among the participants," Feiner says. Feiner, a sophomore philosophy major, asks students interested in becoming Big Seahawks to contact the SGA office to sign up if they have not done so. Already, 400 students have expressed interest in volunteering for the program.

establish six resource centers, located in North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Florida and Texas.

Alexander believes that "the best welfare program in the world is a job. Opportunity is out there, you have to reach out and make it real." Historically, African-Americans have not been treated equitably. NAACP's Home Owners program accesses money that is already available, and treats borrowers equitably. If anyone is interested in attending Home Owners classes, they are encouraged to call Rose Marie Cotton at 1-704-525-6800 at the Resource Center in Charlotte, N.C.

Furthermore, NAACP advocates numerous progress methods such as the AXO program. This twelve year old program allows young people to celebrate their talents, such as poetry, singing, physics and computer science. There are twenty-six different categories that participants compete in at various levels. Many participants have gone on to receive recording contracts, and scholarships to prestigious schools, such as MIT and Stanford.

Furthermore, the Back to School program was created by NAACP to help mentor and tutor young students of all races. NAACP is involved in an ongoing effort to progress as a group. "We should move forward and upward because we ride and fall together," said Alexander. Reciprocity is the name of the game in economics, as well as human relations. "We have to remember that we have no permanent enemies or permanent friends, only permanent interests. We must learn how to forgive those who stepped on our toe yesterday, learn how to work with them today, and still keep a weary eye on tomorrow," said Alexander.

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Arts and Entertainment Editor

I met an interesting fellow around 11:30 PM the other night (April 14th actually) at Hardee's. Well, I didn't actually "meet" him, but we did converse for several minutes.

I first took notice of him when he ordered his meal. I can remember his order clearly: two quarter pound hamburgers. The total for his bill was around $3.75 or something. Anyway, the cashier didn't notice that he had a "Two Quarter Pound Hamburgers for $3.00" coupon.

The clever cashier was a little distressed over the coupon bit and took the next few minutes revamping his order on the sophisticated cash register system. The elder customer proceeded to tell the Hardee's guy all about the Bill Clinton Administration and Clinton's sneaky, dirty, and ugly ideas to increase the taxes that the working American had to pay. The customer was upset at the forms he had to use to fill out his taxes and the overall amount he had to pay. After all, it was the day before the April 15th deadline.

I cleverly interjected into the conversation and mentioned that I, myself, had to write the State of North Carolina a check for $1.00 (for the second year in a row) to cover my state taxes. He studied me for a few seconds and then told me about every single payment he was going to have to make that week. He also pointed out to me that the coupon he used for the hamburgers was very important to his cash flows because of the $216.40 insurance payment he had to make on his car. Plus, you economists out there might find it interesting to know that in the next four years, we are going to have to pay $1,200 more in taxes. Thank you Hardee's for the continual entertainment.

For you I-40 westbound travelers out there, you might (or might not) find this funny. I was traveling down I-40 heading for Greensboro last Thursday when I was suddenly struck off guard. Right before you get to Raleigh, there are road signs that mention the thriving metropolis of "Fuquay-Varina." Well, ever since I was in tenth grade, I always said "Funky Fuquay-Varina" when I pass this sign or any sign mentioning this town. I know that's a stupid and immature thing to do, but WDCG 105.1 FM out of Durham had a song entitled Funky Fuquay-Varina (parodied after Funky Cold Medina) that sticks with me to this day. And anyone that knows me knows that I JUST LOVE TO SING!

On the trip to Raleigh via I-40 West, there are three of these signs between Benson and the state capital. I passed the first sign and began my chant. When I got to the next sign, I was taken so off guard, I almost wrecked my car. Someone had gotten some spray paint (white of course) and altered the "r" in Varina to a "g," hence, transforming it to Vagina. So, when I got to perfectly vandalized sign, I actually sang Funky Fuquay-Vagina. Needless to say, this opens a whole new world of new jokes. I don't think I will tell any of them. Oh well, those clever hillbillies never cease to amaze me.

Well, folks, this is the part of the year that I like the best. This will be the last edition of The Seahawk for the 1992-1993 school year. I must say that this year has been a great one and definitely one of change. I hope everyone out there has enjoyed the paper, especially the Arts and Entertainment section. If you haven't, sorry.

As of this time, I'm not sure if I will be on the newspaper staff next year. I haven't been re-hired yet, but there is a 99.9999% chance that I will be here again for the 1993-1994 year. Isn't that special? No, seriously, I should be here for another year of fine entertainment for my 33 readers. If anyone out there has ever thought of writing for the paper, just let us know. The Seahawk's convenient offices are located in the University Union, room 205-E. You don't need any prior experience (obviously) and it can be fun.

I hope everyone has a GREAT summer break and study for those exams! I hope you make the grades and come back next year!

Until next time (and semester)!

Review of Gruntruck - "PUSH"

BY TODD ALLRED
Music Correspondent

Try to imagine a steamroller trashing its way across a tightrope. A ridiculous image, I know, but a somehow appropriate one for this review.

On one side of the tightrope is the New York noise-band Helmet. On the other is Seattle's latest success, the dreary grunge-metal rockers Alice In Chains. The steamroller, here, is the topic of discussion here, is yet another Seattle band, Gruntruck.

PUSH is Gruntruck's second album, although I have never seen or heard their first one. Things get moving very quickly with the album's opener, Tribe, which is a current MTV Headbanger's Ball favorite. In fact, the opening guitar riff is of mammoth proportions. This is good. Tribe is all throughout very catchy and deserving of all the airplay it gets.

When one thinks of Seattle, one conjures up images of Nirvana and Soundgarden and that entire elaborate grunge scene up there. For people who might actually be worried, Gruntruck sounds absolutely nothing like Nirvana, but has a far catchier sound than Soundgarden.

Of particular note are the ever changing and at times amazing vocals of Ben McMillan. Sure, he yells a lot, but the man can sing and sing like he means it. At times McMillan's voice sounds like a melodic version of Soundgarden's Chris Cornell crossed with a sober Ozzy Osbourne. Listen to Crazy Love and you'll see what I'm talking about.

Now, back to that tightrope image. Rarked features frenetic fretwork reminiscent of about anything off of Helmet's Mesatime, but better. Helmet is great at loud noise, but Gruntruck takes this a step further: they write loud, noise and catchy songs. Follow, on the other hand, sounds a bit like Alice in Chains, slow and very heavy. I guess this is okay since Gruntruck is currently touring with Alice in Chains.

Song number ten, Body Farm, is the best tune on PUSH because it manages to be even catchier than Tribe.

The musicianship is excellent and the production perfect for stereo cranking. Also, there are really no throw away songs. I liked them all and didn't find myself flipping through any of them. This is highly commendable.

To sum it all up, Gruntruck borrows bits and pieces (and sometimes large chunks) of other similar bands without really sounding like copycats. I also must admit I liked this album better than Helmet's Mesatime or Alice in Chains' Dirt. Maybe nothing really new, but its one of those rare albums that is actually worth what you pay for it. That's good enough for me!

Overall Rating: A

Looking Ahead

The March '92 release of Obituary's third album could very well signify the end of death metal as we know it. For after the outside world falls victim to this deadly sonic assault, there will be no need for further death metal albums. Thanks to Obituary, The End Complete is all you'll ever need.

Recorded in the fall of 1991 at Morrisound Studios (the legendary Tampa, Florida recording hall that drips metallic blood) with caretaker and producer Scott Burns, The End Complete is Obituary's third and most triumphant outing since the Brandon, FL. quintet formed back in 1985. By meshing the sheer power of last year's Cause of Death with the lightning burst of speed that have their debut, Slowly We Rot, its venomous sparkle, the Obies have constructed an album as fresh to the senses as it is pure Obituary.

Obituary's approach to song writing is one from which many bands can learn. The key is discipline; knowing when to weave textured patterns of intricacy and when to just bludgeon along, simplistic and deafening.

It's only natural that The End Complete would bear similarities to Slowly We Rot, considering these two albums share a common bond the group temporarily lacked during the Cause of Death era: guitarist Allen West. A vital influence in the writing of Slowly We Rot, West then decided to leave Obituary to tend to personal matters. His replacement for Cause of Death was former Agent Steel/Death guitarist James Murphy. After extensive touring across the States and Europe, a rift developed between Murphy and Obituary, causing a permanent split between the two. At that point, West had remedied his situation, and it was obvious to everyone that he and Obituary would be reunited.

On the other hand, love and hate, peace and violence, subtle and harsh... trading upon and submissive... emotions that soothe or tear your insides out and cave your head in. Rooted in the back of mankind's most intense emotion, FEAR FACTORY instills emotions beyond mere words, while forcing re-evaluation of limits in extreme music.

"A lot of our riffs are very discordant," explains founding member, chief songwriter, guitarist Dino Cazares, "giving a real heavy emotional element to the music. And I wouldn't want to categorize it as just industrial, death metal, or grindcore... if I had to classify it, it would be an extreme alternative to all of those forms of music." One thing is for certain: FEAR FACTORY is the ultimate union of death metal, industrial, alternative, grindcore and any other musical genre you can imagine. The Los Angeles based band is taking extreme music to new levels. Welcome to the future of extremity!

Completed by vocalist Burton C. Bell, drummer Raymond Herrera and bassist Andrew Shives, FEAR FACTORY breathed life first in October of 1990. Two initial low budget demos surfaced before the band recorded what was to be their debut LP for a local L.A. based indie in October 1991. After the record was complete, contract negotiations between the band and the label broke down and the record was shelved. The 16 song LP, which became the band's newest demo, found its way to the offices of Roadrunner Records in New York, resulting in brand new deal and a precious new recording opportunity.

Upon signing in May 1992, FEAR FACTORY entered Grand Master Recording in Hollywood with UK producer Colin Richardson (Fudge Tunnel, Carcass, Napalm Death, Bolt Thrower) and belted out the 17 tracks comprising their official debut, Soul Of A New Machine. Mixing was completed at Fon Studios in Sheffield, England in late June.

Soul of A New Machine differs it's predecessor in nine newer tracks that bring the band further into experimental sounds. Tunes like Moribund, Leechmaster, Scapagoat, Lifeblind, and Self Immolation show off FEAR FACTORY at their strongest, taking full advantage of the multi-faceted voice of Burton C. Bell, who can switch from a brutal growl to an almost angelic whisper at a second's notice.

While elements of brutal death metal do surface in FEAR FACTORY's music, the band reside 3,000 miles from Florida, equating as much in musical distance, with crushing innovative power and song writing prowess that few bands from the swampy neiber region possess. It's FEAR FACTORY's openness for progressive sounds and ideas (the band experiments with technology previously tapped only in industrial dance), that separates the men from the boys, trend setters from the followers, and more importantly, the great from the lame.

Beginning in April, Obituary embarks on a US tour in support of their third Roadrunner release, The End Complete. After completing the West Coast dates with Biohazard and Sick of It All, FEAR FACTORY will tour with label mates Obituary in support of their debut epic Soul Of A New Machine, and the soon to be released EP Fear Is The Mind Killer.

The tour will go throughout the end of May and will reach the East Coast and Mid West. On Tuesday, May 11th, Obituary and FEAR FACTORY will be performing at The Mad Monk.

THE LOCAL SCENE

BY MATT JORGENSON
Music Correspondent

Several weeks ago I made it out to the old "3 bands for 3 bucks" gig at The Mad Monk to see some more of our local music. The triple bill featured Brickbat, Spore, and Betrayer (in that order) in a "Triple Thrash Threat."

The crowd was kind of small (in other words, you need to start going to see more live music) but the bands and the five cent draft was awesome.

Brickbat started off the night with a great show. They have a great hard-core sound that proves this style of music isn't going anywhere. It's hard and heavy and they do a great job of mixing fast and slow beats in their songs. Definitely check these guys out! They're going to play again tonight with another awesome local band, All Tore Up. Don't miss that show because I want to see a crazy mosh pit going all night.

Ex-Corrosion of Conformity singer/bassist Mick Dean brought his new band Spore out on stage second. Here is another three guys that kick ass on stage. You can hear the old style Corrosion of Conformity in their music but they've added a touch of rock and roll that has the effect of mellowing the old COC sound (but by no means are these guys mellow). Two words: awesome band.

Finally Betrayer came out on stage. By far, these guys were the hardest, heaviest, and loudest of the three. Don't quote me on this but I believe they have added a few members going from 3 to 5. The extra guitarist and new vocalist give this band an awesome Kreator/Pantera sound that just simply goes off. I was dying for a pit during the show but one did not occur (much to my dismay). Fans of Pantera, Kreator, Sodom, etc... should not miss these guys, they're incredible!

The LaCrosse Club hosted a tournament this past weekend. UNCW went 1 and 2 with a victory over ASU and losses to NCSU and ECU. This would be the last event of the season for the UNCW X-men, although UNCW will have two of its top players competing in a College All-Star game on May 1st in Baltimore, MD.

The Women's Soccer Club will finish its season this coming Sunday, April 25th, in a home game against Unidas, from Jacksonville, NC.

The Surf Club will be competing in the East Coast Championships this weekend. The contest will take place at New Symema Beach, FL. They will be closing their season with a qualifying event on May 2nd in Atlantic Beach, NC. They will then send their top surfers to San Clemente, CA for the NSSA Nationals on June 23rd -27th.

The Sailing Club hosted the 1st Annual Lasser Open Invitational Regatta this past weekend. There were 28 boats in the event in which UNCW had four representatives. The regatta was open to all and participants ranged from Olympic contenders to juniors. Glenn Walker, of UNCW captured 6th place in the race.

Last, but not least, as finals come to an end, UNCW's Ultimate teams will begin competing in the 1993 UPA College Division Series. Sectionals will be on May 1st and 2nd at ECU. Regionals will be held here at UNCW on May 8th and 9th. Nationals will be held over Memorial Day weekend in Lehigh, PA. Both the mens and womens teams are defending regional champions for three years running now and the SeaWeed are the defending national champions.

The Office of Recreation and Intramural Programs would like to say good luck to the SeaMen and the SeaWeed as well as all other sports clubs. That will be representing UNCW in national scholastic events.

Stress-Exercise Connection

If you're feeling overwhelmed due to the Spring semester coming to a close and final exams around the corner, you are not alone. Most students are feeling very stressed out at this time of year.

It has been proven that regular exercise can help reduce stress through physiological and psychological mechanisms. Anxiety causes your body to create physical tension. Your glands produce "stress hormones" that increase blood pressure, pulse rate, and pulse intensity. Also, your blood sodium rises and breathing becomes rapid and shallow.

Stress-arousal once prepared your primitive ancestors to flee or fight in the face of danger. Today, most challenges are emotional or mental. Because a physical reaction is usually inappropriate, the stress-induced energy remains trapped in your body. Prolonged stress-arousal has been shown to cause or aggravate headaches, back pain, arthritis, PMS, urinary tract infections, adult acne, and event dandruff.

David Endlers, PhD, a psychoanalyst and director of the Stress Center in New York, suggests you use that undesirable stress induced energy in the manner it was meant to be used: physically. Exercise can increase blood circulation, use up adrenaline, and help establish deep, rhythmic breathing. The diffusion of the stress response seems to have a calming effect.

Many experts believe that endorphins released during exercise and at other times, play a major role in this stress reduction by acting as natural tranquilizers. Regular exercise results in more endorphins getting into the system and staying there longer.

Psychological factors may also contribute to the de-stressing of regular exercisers. Psychologists believe that coping techniques learned while dealing with the physical stress of exercise are somehow adapted for use with other types of stress.

Regular exercise tends to boost self-esteem.

People with high self-esteem tend to be happy and more prepared to deal with stress.

In these upcoming weeks of final exams and papers due, remember that you have the power to relieve your own stress! Come on over to the Heart and Sole Fitness Center and work off some STRESS!!

* The regularly scheduled hours for the Heart and Sole Fitness Center will be in effect during exams*

Last weekend the UNCW Baseball team took on conference leading George Mason University in a three game series, a double header on Saturday and another game on Sunday. In the first game, UNCW came out on top of what turned out to be a heart stopper that went 11 innings and ended with a score of 8-7.

Corey Broome continued his hot hitting by taking two balls deep for home runs. Broome's first hit was the high point in a five run second inning that gave the Seahawks a comfortable 6-0 lead. Kevin Hooker who went 4 for 5 with two doubles, started the scoring in the first inning with an RBI single that scored Sal D'Esposito. Hooker also scored off a double by Brian Tatum in the fifth to give UNCW a 7-3 lead.

George Mason (18-7 overall, 6-1 CAA), who has come from behind in three of five conference wins this season, hung tough.

George Mason whittled the Seahawks, lead away by scoring single runs in the third, sixth, and seventh and by scoring two RBIs in the fifth and ninth.

The winning pitcher for the game was Heath Altman, who needs just one more save to break the single season record. Altman came in relief of Keith Pettus. Altman got off to a shaky start giving up an RBI and a sacrifice fly that tied the score, before retiring the side.

In the second game of the double header, George Mason jumped out to an early 2-0 lead in the second inning. The Seahawks tied the game 3-3 in the seventh on a double by Chris McBride that scored Kevin Hooker. George Mason put it away by scoring two runs in the eighth.

UNCW fared no better Sunday falling 14-1. UNCW's record is 19-20 overall and 5-6 in CAA play. UNCW will be in action again this weekend when they take on conference foe Old Dominion.

Reggie Veney, Tim Shaw, and Keith Adkins will be in action tomorrow night for their final Trask Coliseum appearance.

Tales From The Dumpster

BY ERIK TOTTON
Sports Editor

Well this is it everybody, the final episode of Tales From the Dumpster (for this year anyway). Since this is our last issue of the paper I thought I would leave you with a few thoughts and predictions for the rest of the year. Surely my thoughts are worthy of being included in the Dumpster (sometimes that's about all they are worth). As for my predictions, these could be mentioned no other place other than The Dumpster.

First my predictions, these are coming from someone who not only got all of the final four right but also picked NC to win it all, so you may want to run out and place your bets with your hookie as soon as you read these. First, the NBA Finals. As I look into my little crystal ball I see the Boston Celtics rising out of the basement they are in and taking on the Los Angeles Lakers with the Celtics winning it all.... no wait, that was my 83-84 prediction. All right, jumping back to the present, I see the New York Knicks taking on the Seattle Super Sonics. OK that's it, that's the prediction, but wait, there's more, don't run out and tell all of your friends yet. There is still valuable information to be gleaned from The Dumpster.

Also in professional sports I see the Cleveland Indians rising up and taking Major League Baseball by storm, and blowing open such a huge lead in the American Eastern Division that it becomes all but impossible for them to do anything but win. I also see a little bit of bad news for you Braves fans. In a freak game of tug-of-war (Smoltz and Glavine against Avery and Maddux) the first four starting pitchers all separate their shoulders and have to sit out the season. That leaves just Smith to carry the load and regrettably the Braves slip out of contention.

In another professional sport of which I have vast knowledge, I see the.... lets see here, I am going down the list.... wait a minute, OK this is it, I see the Pittsburgh Penguins successfully defending the Cup under leadership of Mario.

Now we turn to another venue, that we all share a common interest in, baseball. The CAA Tournament will be held here shortly, so I think I should give you the pick for that. I know that George Mason will probably be the favorite, but I see the UNCW Seahawks taking out those unreliable Patriots and capturing the CAA crown. Also in college sports, I see senior Amy Jackson competing in the NCAA track meet and leaving the competition far behind on her way to the 5000 meter championship.

All right, that's it everybody, my thoughts and predictions for the rest of the year (I hope there is enough to last you). Hopefully I will see you all back here next year. Have a good summer and don't forget to leave a special place in your heart for The Dumpster.

They said it.....

The UNCW men's and women's tennis teams traveled to the University of Richmond and James Madison University last weekend for the Colonial Athletic Association Championships. The teams concluded their season on a sour note with both teams losing their opening matches. Host Richmond took the top spot, capturing the CAA Tournament.

The men's team which traveled to University of Richmond, wrapped up their season with a pair of losses, losing to Old Dominion in the first round, 4-0 and James Madison, 4-2 in the second round. The team finished the tournament tied for seventh. Three seniors closed out their careers for the men's team: German Alvarez, Chris Cagle, and Alvaro Bedoya. Final individual singles records for the men were: German Alvarez (13-8), Chris Cagle (7-14), Jimmy Whitehead (8-10), Mike Rayos (9-9), Alvaro Bedoya (8-12), Claudio Silberberg (3-13), Chad Oxendine (5-5), and John McGuire (0-4).

The women's tennis team also had a difficult outing, failing to score in the CAA Tourney at Harrisonburg, VA. Every entry for the Lady Seahawks lost in the opening round. The women finished tied for fifth with East Carolina and George Mason. William and Mary won the tournament.

Final individual records for the women were: Sandy Williford (2-12), Sacha Doran (6-8), Kary Symons (8-6), Joanne Pautz (3-11), Wendy Kristel (7-2), Becky Baker (6-5), Jenny Kraemer (3-1), and Debra Ashness (1-0).

Coaching list narrowed And Then There Were Five

BY ERIK TOTTON

After looking over the application pool for the women's basketball head coaching position Athletic Director Paul Miller announced the five final candidates. The coaches are (in no particular order):

* June Oikowski: Coach Oikowski is the top assistant at the University of Auburn.

* Susan Yow: Coach Yow is currently at Kansas State. Kansas State defeated UNCW in the finals of the US Air Classic Tournament.

* Trudi Lacey: Lacey is a former All-American player at N.C. State and is now head coach at South Florida.

* Kim Mulkey-Robertson: Coach Mulkey-Robertson is part of one of the most successful programs in the country. Mulkey-Robertson is assistant coach at Louisiana Tech.

* Frank DiLeo: Coach DiLeo is assistant coach for the University of Virginia. Virginia was ranked first in the country last year.

The candidates are being interviewed this week and should be finished by next Tuesday. After the interviewing is completed Miller will submit a list of three names to Chancellor Leutze who will then decide.

Moving to Texas A&M

Hanson Resigns Post

By JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

For the first time since 1989, a new UNCW academic year will begin without Lanita Hanson. She will be leaving UNCW on Tuesday, August 24, to become the Greek Life Coordinator at Texas A & M University in College Station, Texas.

"It's a new professional challenge," Hanson said of her career move. "It will fulfill my desire to work in a bigger university."

Working at UNCW, she said, was a growing and challenging professional experience. "I was fortunate the students I worked with have been high-calibre, innovative members of the student body," Hanson said. "I will miss the students I worked with incredibly."

In her four years at UNCW as the Student Organization Program Coordinator, Hanson oversaw a remarkable growth in student organizations and brought two national programs of note to this campus.

During her tenure, Hanson helped develop the Student Activities Office which has seen a 150% growth in student organizations (80 in 1989 to 120 today), a 100% increase in the number of students involved in the Greek system, helped seven sororities and fraternities go national, and brought College Bowl and the National Student Exchange to UNCW.

"Lanita's four years with UNCW have seen enormous amount of change within the student activities area as well as within the Union department and campus as a whole," Linda Moore, Director of the University Union, said. "...she'll be missed here."

Hanson will depart UNCW on Tuesday, August 24. There will be a reception in her honor in the University Union Living Room on Monday, August 23, in the afternoon. She begins her job at Texas A & M on August 26.

Alden Blake, an Association for Campus

Entertainment chairperson summed up the feelings of the office upon hearing of Hanson's pending departure. "It's UNCW's loss that she is leaving."

First Renovation in eight years

Bookstore gets new look

By AMY BRENNAN
News Editor

Students returning to campus this fall will find many changes. Among these, the bookstore has been completely renovated.

The renovations include the addition of 2,000 square feet and the implementation of a point of sale system. This system allows students to get checks approved in the check-out line instead of going to the customer service desk. It also means that charge cards can be read immediately at the register. Previously, the account number of the card had to be approved which meant calling for approval and then waiting. During busy times like the beginning of the semester, the wait could be a long one. It is also possible to use the Id Plus system in the bookstore.

A bar code system is also being put in place. Scanners like those used in grocery stores will read bar codes placed on items. These systems are intended to speed up the check-out process and expedite crowds.

Bookstore manager Arnold Siko says the bookstore renovations were made because of the demands made by increasing enrollment. "This will help us to better serve the campus community by handling students more effectively and rapidly," he said.

The bookstore has gone through many changes since the university opened. Originally, the bookstore was housed in Hinton

James Hall where the Financial Aid Office is now located. In 1977, the bookstore moved to a metal building that stood where the planter outside of the Burney Student Support Center now stands. In 1985, the Burney Center was built specifically for the bookstore. This is the first renovation made in eight years.

Mr. Siko says he is satisfied with what has been done and he doesn't foresee any more changes for at least five years.

Mr. Siko, who has been the bookstore manager for 18 years, noted that the costs of renovation will not affect the price of books. "Book prices are set by the publisher and the bookstore marks them up at a rate that covers freight and other handling charges," Siko said. "We don't receive any state funding for our operation. Many people are surprised to learn that."

Other new features in the bookstore include a new ceiling, lighting fixtures, carpet, and a sprinkler system. The entrance has been changed to glass so it is possible to see into the store. The customer service desk has been enlarged to provide better service and handle more students.

Two new services are now available to students in the bookstore. Incoming freshmen can participate in the textbook reserve program which allows students to reserve books ahead of time and save money by buying used books. Mr. Siko says the program is doing well. "In this, the third year, over 700 freshmen participated."

Students who receive financial aid may be eligible to receive up to $250 of their refund money to purchase books. Financial Aid Director Joe Capell said award letters were mailed to those students who were eligible based on need. Most of the eligible students are Pell Grant recipients. "After this week we won't give out any more of these notices," Capell said. "If students don't have their books by the first two weeks of school, they've got big trouble anyway."

The bookstore staff meets with parents and freshmen during summer orientation to set up the reserve program. The registrar gives the staff a list of courses for students in the program. The reserved books are pulled in August when the residence halls open.

Mr. Siko really enjoys working with the students, particularly the freshmen. "This is a service we provide to help them get familiar with the bookstore."

It's a good way to get to know the students," Siko said. "You couldn't have a better job."

The bookstore will have extended hours for the first week of school: Thursday, Aug. 19 hours are 7:45 a.m.-7:00 p.m.; Friday, Aug. 20: 7:45 a.m.-6:00 p.m.; Saturday, Aug. 21: 10 a.m.-2:00 p.m. Aug. 23-26: 7:45 a.m.-6:30 p.m.

Greetings from your president

Dear Fellow Students,

Greetings and salutations from Ziggy Nix, your student body president. I hope you had a great summer and are ready for your classes. In the Student Government Office, we have been working on many different projects for the coming year. We are off to a quick start this semester. The consignment bookstore will be selling books out of the SGA office (UU 200). Fall elections will be September 14 and 15. If you want to run for election to SGA, please come by the office (UU 200) and pick up an application by September 3. There are seven Fall Rep-at-large seats open and four Freshman class officers (President, Vice-president, and two senators) open. If you do not want to be involved with elections, but are interested in SGA there are plenty of committees and organizations that would be happy to have you assist them.

Starting on Tuesday, August 24 our legal services program will be located in the Student Government Office (UU 200).

The first Senate meeting of the semester will be August 23 at 6:00 p.m. in University Union Room 100. You are welcome to come to the meeting and see what's going on in Student Government.

I hope you have a year filled with loving, laughing, and learning. Please, if you have any problems (big or small) or just have an idea you want to share, don't hesitate to come by and talk to me. My door is always open. All you have to do is come in.

Freshmen Make Transitions to Life at UNCW

By AMY BRENNAN
News Editor

For new freshmen arriving at UNCW, classwork may be one of the easier challenges to contend with. The real challenge for many will be adjusting to all the changes that college life brings.

This fall, UNCW Housing and Residence Life sponsored a program called "Transitions" which is designed to help freshmen make the social and academic adjustments associated with college.

Dr. Richard Mullendore, associate vice chancellor for Student Affairs says it is necessary to integrate students academically and socially as quickly as possible if they are going to succeed in their college experience. "The first four to six weeks are crucial in influencing a student's decision to remain in college. Transitions is designed to do just that."

The four-day program included small group presentations dealing with topics such as study skills, time management, and living with roommates. It also gave freshmen the chance to visit local areas of interest. There were trips to Wrightsville Beach, Jungle Rapids theme park, and a boat cruise down the Intracoastal Waterway from Carolina Beach into the Cape Fear River.

For many students who arrived on Saturday, Sunday's boat cruise was the first opportunity they had to socialize in an unstructured atmosphere. Students spent their time on the boats dancing and talking to each other.

Gary Gajewski, a freshman from Conn., had just arrived and spent the day unpacking. As a result, he had not yet had time to meet many other students. The cruise was the first opportunity he had to relax.

Watching other students dance, he said, "I feel like these kids all know each other already. Then there's me. I don't know anybody yet."

With an incoming freshman class of approximately 1,375, it's easy to feel lost in the crowd. That feeling is typical for new freshmen. In reality, many of the students Gajewski thought were old friends were actually new acquaintances.

One of the best ways to meet people is to join clubs and organizations. In a speech given Monday in Kenan Auditorium to about 175 freshmen, Student Government President Ziggy Nix encouraged all students to get involved in campus activities.

"There are a lot of organizations on campus. There's something for everyone," Nix said. "Joining is a great way to meet people. The more involved you get with your school, the more enjoyable your college experience will be."

To find out about organizations that are available, call the Student Activities Office at 395-3827.

Police Blotter

by AMY BRENNAN
News Editor

The UNCW Campus Police Department is implementing a new program that is intended to improve the relationship between campus police and the community.

The "Police and Community Networking" program consists of six volunteer officers who will work with the Residence Assistants in all of the residence halls.

Another program is a self defense course for women called Rape Aggression Defense. RAD is two hours per day for four days. The program is a combination of prevention strategies and self-defense moves for women.

The campus police department hopes that by working closely with students the communication and trust between the two can be improved. "We want to break the ice and get rid of the stigma of the police," said officer Shawn Thomas, who is assigned to Galloway Hall.

Getting the students and the police acquainted and on good terms will give crime prevention programs a tremendous boost.

Various programs will be implemented throughout the year. Interested candidates can apply to be in the ride along program. This gives civilians the chance to ride with an officer for a shift to see what goes on and how the officers handle different situations. "This way students can see that we're fair and we're not out to harass you. It gives students the chance to see the human side of police officers," said Officer Thomas.

Cancellation of Course Registration Policy

A department chairperson, upon recommendation of the instructor, may cancel a student's registration in any course offered in that department if the registered student fails to attend the first class meeting and fails to notify the department office of a desire to remain enrolled within 24 hours of the class time. This cancellation action will only take place when a course is fully enrolled and additional students are waiting to enroll.

The appropriate dean's office should notify the relevant department chairperson of late-arriving students who cannot attend the first class meeting because of illness or other reasons approved by the dean of the college, the professional schools or the dean of students.

If cancellation action is taken by a department chairperson, the registration openings resulting from this action will be offered to students seeking enrollment in the courses during the official drop/add period. Students who have been authorized to add a course should follow the normal drop/add procedures printed in the semester schedule.

Student appeals resulting from emergencies or other extenuating circumstances will be considered on a case-by-case basis in the appropriate dean's office.

Small businesses key to racial unity

John Shipley Butler tries hard to avoid putting anyone down. "It's not a question of either/or," he keeps saying. But for all his gentleness of tone, he cannot suppress his belief that black America made a near fatal mistake when it abandoned business as its principal route to the American mainstream.

"Abandoned" is the right word, says this University of Texas (Austin) professor of sociology and management, on a recent visit to Washington. "We have a strong history as entrepreneurs, going back to the 1700s. Blacks were the Jews and Japanese of America, the owners of small shops not just in the black sections but all over town. And the descendants of those entrepreneurs have, like the more recent Asian immigrants, overwhelmingly sent their children to college and into the professions."

So what went wrong? Principally, the 46-year-old Butler believes, it was the displacement of entrepreneurs, who used to constitute the black leadership, by ministers and, to a lesser degree, politicians.

"There's nothing wrong with preachers and politicians per se," he says. "We need what they bring—the spiritual element and the need for political involvement. But going back to the 1950s and the beginning of the civil rights movement, we began moving away from business to politics. The result is we have become too focused on fairness—what somebody is doing to us or not doing for us—and almost contemptuous of business, especially small business."

"As a matter of fact, a focus on rights practically forces you to think in terms of victimization. A focus on business forces you to look for opportunity. That's the main difference between us and, say, Vietnamese Americans."

"If there is to be a 'third movement' (to follow the desegregation and civil rights movements), this is where we ought to place our focus."

Butler explores these ideas, based on his extensive research, in his recent book, Entrepreneurship and Self-Help Among Black Americans: A Reconsideration of race and Economics (State University of New York Press).

He won't discount the importance of the civil rights battles led by the preachers and politicians. Indeed, he owns that he has benefited from those fights. But most of the benefits, he argues, went to people who were, like him, credentialed and prepared. What we have overlooked, he says, is that entry level entrepreneurs are not bound by credentials. All they need is an idea and the ability to sell it to financial backers, including family and friends.

"I remember asking an East Indian I interviewed for my book how it happened that so many of his fellow-ethnics were in business. He told me a lot of them could not get decent jobs because they didn't have the credentials, or even the language. He put it this way: 'In business, you only have to learn to say two things: $2.95 and thank you.' Their children, of course, go to college."

But it isn't just the chance to bypass the credentialing game that accounts for Butler's devotion to the entrepreneurial route.

"My research shows this phenomenon that is just remarkable," he says. "Along with the entrepreneurship will automatically come other values."

The movement toward higher education, the development of private schools and the building of community institutions. But it begins with the small shops. We can't prove why, but it's a fact."

Butler's own guess is that community entrepreneurs invest in their communities—out of their self-interest as neighborhood residents—and also are on hand as valuable role models.

"Community entrepreneurs are interested in education, recreation, crime control—everything. They provide jobs and role models for neighborhood kids. They support the schools, sponsor Little League baseball, send kids to camp. All those things are in our tradition, but in our focus on rights and political equality, we've lost them."

"Well, not entirely. Durham, N.C., still understands it. In the 1920s and '30s, Durham was considered a model of black economic and Southern success. All the literature said Durham could point to the (white) Duke Tobacco Co. and (black) North Carolina Mutual as examples of Southern progress. Durham still has one of the highest percentages of black college graduates in the country, along with its high rate of professional and entrepreneurs. Durham's black business leaders are running businesses founded by their parents and grandparents."

"And they serve the community. Mechanics and Farmers Bank, for instance, have developed black shopping centers, built black homes, spawned black jobs and is now branching out into the whole Durham area."

Butler offers one last reason for his optimism on business: a study in the National Journal of Sociology.

Early Vietnamese immigrants—despite such advantages as relatively better English, prior socialization to Western culture and access to various forms of governmental assistance—lagged behind Chinese and Korean immigrants, who had none of these things, in their economic development. Their sponsors found them jobs, but they had trouble moving up.

"You know when things changed? When they started to become entrepreneurs. Now they've caught up to their Chinese and Korean counterparts. Shouldn't that tell us something?"

Overbooking is for Airlines, not Universities!

How about all those lucky freshmen who get to live in study lounges instead of actual rooms? Or the people who get to sleep in the living room of the campus apartments? Those lucky devils!

For some unknown reason the Housing and Residence Life overbooked the available spaces by about 125 people. That's absolutely absurd! This is not an airline where ticket holders can be bumped to a later flight or given free tickets to use later. This is a university. You can't get on stand-by here.

The university does have a solution however. Eighty partitions have been rented at a cost of $700 apiece. They also spent around $30,000 on furniture. The total cost to the university for this small error is $86,000. For $86,000 I could think of a more ideal solution. If these housing problems are only temporary, why not rent motel rooms or something? Most motels have good discounts for large groups. Or maybe they could save the money and put the extra people in Trask Coliseum! On second thought, hurricane season is upon us and that space might be needed for area residents.

There are so many things that money could be used for. The really sad thing about this whole deal is that when it's over, the university will have nothing to show for it.

According to the director of Housing and Residence Life, about 40 of these "temporarily" housed students will get to move into actual rooms after classes begin. What about the other 85? Well, to make them feel better, any student who hasn't been moved by the first week in October will get a $200 refund for his or her housing. I know that would make me sleep a lot easier! If I had just spent around $2,000 on housing and was stuck in a partitioned up study lounge I'd be demanding to stay with the housing official who had caused all of this.

I guess it's a good thing I decided against campus living when the housing lady told me I might be tripled up in a room for most of a semester. That was approximately a month ago. If they knew then that they were overbooking, why didn't they stop? I guess they figured that by warning me they had relieved themselves of the responsibility. I strongly urge those of you who are stuck in this situation to do something about it. Don't take this lying down. Especially since there's not much room for lying down. Demand better! Write a letter to the editor. Let your housing director know how you feel.

Oh! Welcome to the University of North Carolina at Wilmington!

Enjoy your stay!

No easy solution to immigration problem

LOS ANGELES—"Nativism," a noun denoting some nasty history, is now an epithet distorting debate about this nation's policy regarding immigration.

Nativism, meaning irrational and mean-spirited partiality toward native-born people and hostility toward immigrants, is as old as the Republic. Before the end of the 18th century German immigrants were stigmatized as an unassimilable ethnic group because of their language and Catholicism. Religious and racial prejudice greeted, among others, Irish immigrants on the East Coast and Chinese on the West Coast.

But xenophobia and greediness—the desire to slam shut the golden door—do not explain all or even most of today's opposition to current immigration policies, particularly here. America is, as The Economist says, "the only first-world country that shares a 2,000-mile border with the third-world. Dirt roads up against bright lights." And the most lurid lights are those of Southern California.

In the 1980's about nine million people immigrated to the United States legally, another two million illegally. Today one-third of all immigrants come to California, where the population, currently 31.5 million, rose by 570,000 last year and is expected to rise another 600,000 this year. Most of the growth is from immigration from Mexico, Central America and Asia, or from births to recent immigrants.

Concern about immigration is approaching monomania in this state where the recession has approached the depths of a depression. Here, as elsewhere, immigration is discussed first, and too much, as an economic issue.

The argument about immigration—what kind of people should come, and in what quantities—is actually two arguments. One is economic, but the more important and interesting one, is cultural.

The economic argument concerns immigration's costs. Is immigration economically injurious? Or do immigrants constitute a net addition to the nation's wealth—if not immediately and in every location, at least over time and to society generally?

Resolution of this argument requires complex calculations that quantify, among many other variables, the economic value of the infusion of entrepreneurial energy from those who travel sometimes 10,000 miles in search of entry-level American jobs. Such industrious immigrants may, or may not, make American industry more suited to an increasingly competitive global economy.

Many immigrants, particularly very new ones, cost more in welfare, health and educational services than they pay in taxes. (All immigrants pay sales taxes; many pay income taxes.) However, their economic activity—earning and spending—makes them, I believe, substantial net contributors to national wealth.

(Twenty-five percent of immigrants in the 1980s had college degrees.) But that positive economic fact does not settle the argument about the net effect, of proper policy concerning, immigration.

The cultural argument about immigration begins with this fact: immigration at the end of this century occurs in a social context different in two crucial ways from the context at the beginning of the century.

Today immigrants are received into a welfare culture that encourages an entitlement mentality. That mentality weakens the mainspring of individual striving for upward mobility. A generous welfare state such as the United States, and California especially, can be a "magnet" for migrants. To the extent that the welfare culture has such enervating effects, the argument for immigration as a source of social invigoration fails.

The second difference in the context of immigration, another difference that makes problematic the tradition of liberality regarding immigration, is the weakening of the ideal of assimilation. But it is unclear the extent to which immigrants themselves are hostile to or even ambivalent about assimilation.

The anti-assimilationist impulse may emanate primarily from those native-born intellectuals who believe America is a sick, racist, sexist, exploitative, oppressive, patriarchal, etc. society into which no self-respecting person would wish to assimilate. Furthermore, say some intellectuals, "diversity" is an inherent good: the more the better because it is good to weaken a sick community's sense of community.

In addition, individual "authenticity" requires adherence to ethnic identity. And ethnicity should be the basis of a civic life built around group rights and entitlements. (Here is an immigration policy: for every 10 immigrants, deport an unhappy tenured professor.)

Such home-grown intellectual fruit can poison the debate about immigration, and perhaps can spoil immigrants. Debate should begin with this premise: America is not just an economy; it is more than an arena for wealth-creation. It is a culture. The high rate of immigration, since 1960, combined with the high fertility rate of immigrants relative to that of native-born Americans, is producing rapid change in the nation's ethnic and cultural balance.

Peter Brimelow, a contributing editor of National Review and senior editor of Forbes, says, "The onus should not be on the critics of current policy to explain their motives. Instead, supporters of current policy must explain why they wish to transform the American nation as it has evolved by 1965."

True. And accusations of "nativism" are not explanations.

Welcome back to another year of academic cheer

Well, it looks like it's time for another round of partying with friends we haven't seen since May, revisiting old haunts, finding new places, meeting new people, and trying to learn something other than if it's possible to hit every College Night special in town and still make it to class in the morning.

With the new year, The Seahawk will debut some new features as well. To the right of this you will see columns written by Washington Post Writers Group members William Raspberry and George Will. We hope you find their views interesting and challenging. The two were chosen because of their reputations as men who tell it like it is and will address any issue. These two are much more qualified to discuss the issues of today than any member of the staff or the readership. But that doesn't mean you cannot write a response to their columns. All correspondences to the paper will be considered for publication.

Last year, a number of people commented that they would have written a letter to the editor but didn't want to have an "Editor's Note" added to their letter. Fair enough. There will be no notes added to letters this year.

We will try harder this year to cover more campus events and highlight the personnel who have been rewarded for their hard work and dedication to the University. Please get in contact with us at 395-3789 or use the campus mail to drop us a line and tell us of an event you consider important. We will do our best to cover all events.

Welcome back!

Wellness: The key to well-being

Write a letter to the editor today! (If you send it through campus mail, it don't cost you nothing)

My vacation worked for me! After days of sailing in a place we had only dreamed of for several years—the islands of Greece—we returned to home and work refreshed and rested. My first day back at work found me beginning plans for all kinds of programs and activities for the 1993-1994 school year. I am excited. It's a brand new year and it is filled with all kinds of opportunities because all kinds of new people are going to be on this campus as well as some old friends, some new programs as well as traditional programs. However familiar it may be, it is still a brand new year.

Whether coming to UNCW the first time or returning, this can be a new and renewing time for you as well. Just do not get caught up in believing that the surface activities of getting into a place to live, finding your classes, getting involved in organizations is all that UNCW is about. Hidden beneath all the activities and requirements and schedules is an incredibly deep pool of potentiality. This place is like Treasure Island! It is loaded with buried treasure, treasure that will enrich your life not in terms of money, but in terms of your personal sense of fulfillment and meaning.

If you ever wanted to change some dimension of your life, this is the place to do it. The resources are here and most of them are included in your fees. Whether you are concerned about study skills, time management, health and nutrition, addictions, having been abused, becoming a leader, developing your faith... There are resources for working on any or all of these issues right here on this campus.

One of the things I worry about the most is the number of students who choose to live on the surface of this pool and simply get by, doing the best they can without making any changes in their lives or values. What a waste this is, simply going to class and getting grades and getting a degree. It is important, to be sure, but the opportunity for "getting an education" as opposed to "getting grades" and making some significant progress in personal development is so great, that not to take advantage of these opportunities is tantamount to wasting two thirds of your experience of being at UNCW.

Part of the treasure trove of resources is an ever arching concept named "Wellness." Wellness is a concept of self care that says that if we want to achieve a state of well-being or wholeness, we need to work toward wholeness in the six areas: physical, occupational, spiritual, intellectual, emotional, and social/environmental. Any hope of becoming a fully alive human being depends on our working toward wholeness in each of these dimensions and understanding how they are all interrelated.

All you need is awareness and initiative, awareness of where you are now in each of these dimensions and initiative to search out through the treasure trove of resources available at UNCW to find what you need to help you develop the potential that lies hidden within you as you take up your student life here at UNCW.

Welcome to this new time in your life. Welcome to a place where you can create your own future. If you would ever like to talk about any of these issues, give me a call at 799-8497. We can go sailing off Wrightsville Beach and share our thoughts.

D. Neal Leeper, Editor

Walker and Kagan Make a Quick Appearance at UNCW

D. Neal Leeper
Entertainment Editor

On Tuesday night, the folks from the Association for On Campus Entertainment (ACE) brought us the professional talents of Randy Kagan (MTV) and Jimmy Walker (Good Times).

Nope. On July 9th, 1992, I was in New York City and had the pleasure of attending a taping of Late Night with David Letterman. It just so happened that Jimmy Walker, Kid DYNOMITE himself, was a guest. His erratic humor and exquisite taste in material made him quite entertaining. When I saw that he was coming to UNCW, I was overjoyed and was looking very forward to seeing him once more.

My good friends at ACE were able to get me backstage before the show for a quick interview. I was very excited and somewhat nervous about meeting such a star. But, when I got backstage and close to Mr. Walker, I was way too disappointed for words.

The total lack of professionalism in the way he spoke, dressed, and behaved totally appalled me. Mr. Walker was wearing some "slipperlike" shoes (the type that parents buy their children to play around in and mess up), old sweatpants (that had seen better days in high school) and a t-shirt that cut off above his belly button exposing his huge gut. When I approached Jimmy for a quick interview, he was prompt in avoiding many questions and replying with fragmented answers.

Jimmy Walker, a resident of the Los Angeles, California and Las Vegas, Nevada area(s) was quick to mention that Wilmington was indeed a "nice city" and was looking "very forward to a great show in Kenan Auditorium." With a busy work schedule of touring forty weeks out of the year, he spends most of his other free time sleeping and resting.

From the smell of him, not much time was spent bathing.

In my opinion, he really wasn't prepared for the UNCW show because of the mild "aroma" that surrounded him, the "grass cutting" clothing he wore, and the fact that he was writing material while standing behind stage. It seemed to me at the time, because of the lack of deodorant on Jimmy's body, that he probably hadn't showered since the last taping of Good Times. But, with the 150 people in the audience, who would know, especially since I was the only press member behind the curtain. When asked about his outlook for the future, Walker said, "Well, we'll see tomorrow." Mr. Walker, thank goodness you ain't in Wilmington no more!

Randy Kagan, on the other hand, was a different sort of comic. When asked for an interview, Randy was more than willing to discuss anything that came to mind in a friendly, professional manner. He was well dressed and well prepared for his show.

Kagan, a resident of Venice Beach, California, has just signed a three year contract with MTV Networks. Several interesting television shows are in the process of negotiations and a pilot for a new show should be on the air soon. Kagan hasn't been appeared on any of the major talk shows because of the fear of "dropping through the cracks." Kagan comments, "I would like to go on Letterman when I have developed."

Kagan's performance was average and he kept the audience entertained. Needless to say, his overall performance was far better than that of Jimmy Walker. Kagan seemed more down to earth and focused on what he was trying to say. It seems to me that he is a future oriented person and we will probably see him on a Showtime hour special sometime soon. But, for now, we'll send him back to California to hang out with the "Brat Pack."

The entire show lasted only a hour and twenty minutes, with a delayed starting time of half an hour. After looking back in retrospect, I feel that ACE should focus more on some talent rather than names. I guess I will sit around and wait until Carrot Top comes back in November. Now there is a show. Until next time!

Summer Study Abroad

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

This summer, I was fortunate enough to spend a month in a foreign country while receiving credit for it. I, along with seventeen others, went to Barbados for an archaeological field school with Dr. Lofffield. Without a doubt, this was the time of my life.

The course itself is an actual "hands on" archaeological dig. The work is somewhat hard, but that is all you do for the class. There is no text book to read, no boring lectures to sit through, and above all else, NO EXAMS! The only academic thing you do is keep a field journal of what you've done and what you think it means.

Aside from the course, the island offers tons of fun for people from all walks of life. For starters, the drinking age in Barbados is fifteen. So, unless you are some child prodigy, you will be able to drink anywhere you want. Add this to the fact that a pint of rum and a 16 oz. Coca-Cola costs $2.00 and you will soon see that Barbados is one partying place. For all you surfers out there, the waves there are HOT! Chest to head high waves are the norm and overhead says are quite common. On several occasions the waves were quite hollow and made for some good tube rides. If surf is the reason you are going, here are two pointers: First, be pumped up because you will have to paddle over a quarter of a mile to get out to the reef break. Second, bring a good but of equipment to repair dings. If you have the means, bring two boards. Surf boards on the island are scarce so you might be able to get some good money for one of them.

Other activities include several places to do some great dancing (Harbor Lights and The Jolly Roger), great caves to go in and see, and shopping galore. If altered states of consciousness is what you are into, then you're really in luck. If you get up with John the Baptist (a rasta local to the place where we stayed), then you'll have more mushrooms than you can possibly eat at no charge. By the end of the trip, you'll be tired of people asking you if you need any reefer. And like I said, rum is dirt cheap.

On a side note, as in the United States, drugs are illegal, so while they are readily available, be careful and do not get caught. Being in prison in a foreign country is not my idea of fun.

Everyone should go on some type of foreign study abroad. Barbados is just one of the many and any of them would be worth taking a loan out of a bank in order to go. Check out the ones that pertain to your major or just pick one in a country you've always wanted to visit. I think only five or six in our group were anthropology majors. For more information on archaeology in Barbados, contact Dr. Lofffield in the Sociology/Anthropology department.

Review of U2 - ZOORUPA

Todd Alfred
Entertainment Writer

Before I begin this review, I must admit I've never really been a huge U2 fan. War and The Joshua Tree were both fantastic albums which got loads of play on my stereo. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said for Achtung Baby. With the exception of two or three songs, Achtung Baby left me rather bored.

I did not even know U2 had a new album coming out until I saw the monotonous Numb video on MTV. I changed the channel after a minute.

So it was without great expectations that I first listened to Zooropa (which I borrowed for free from a kind neighbor). The first song and title track Zooropa treads along slowly in some sort of drugged-out Pink Floyd territory. It is both mellow and entrancing - nicely complimented by layers of fuzzy, echoing guitars and arcade game bleeps and blips. Sound unusual? It is. A pretty cool tune, but unfortunately followed by two remarkable dull tracks - Babyface and Numb. (Why did they release that one as a hit?)

Just as I'm about to hit fast forward, Lemon kicks in with its strangely-tuned guitars and takes me by surprise. This is a great song where lead singer Bono sings falsetto and comes across sounding like a deranged Karl Walling (of World Party).

Daddy's Gonna Pay for the Car You Crashed resembles some lazy Techno song, using samples from MC900ft. Jesus. Pretty strange, but certainly not boring.

The First Time is a pretty song, bound to win the women over, but is somewhat marred by Bono's painful high notes.

Strangely enough, the most memorable song on Zooropa is one where Bono takes a backseat to Johnny Cash. Yes, you heard me right. Johnny Cash. At first, I wondered what in the hell I was listening to, but then decided it would make a groovy theme to an old spaghetti western flick. There is something very haunting about this song which is entitled The Wanderer.

To give U2 credit, Zooropa does not sound remotely like anything else the band (or anyone else for that matter) has ever recorded. This is partly due to all of the weird noise effects and arcade sounds that are prevalent throughout the album.

On the song Zooropa they sound cool and innovative, but on songs like Stay they seem to be there to disguise the boredom.

U2 scores direct hits on about five or six of the songs on Zooropa. Maybe they should consider releasing an EP next time.

Overall rating: C+ (Pretty bizarre and atmospheric, but unless you are a die-hard fan, don't rush out and buy it)

With the new semester already underway, I'm sure that many of you have found that you have a little extra time on your hands, right? Well, maybe so, maybe not. Even if you don't have too much free time, I would like for you to consider writing for the Arts and Entertainment section for The Seahawk.

If you have any interests in music, books, movies, plays, concerts, or anything "artsy" and entertaining, I can definitely find a place for you. No prior experience is really necessary.

After all, this is a learning experience for us all. I firmly believe that after a while, you will notice this to be true.

So, if you're interested, stop by room 205-E in the student union (not the university center) and fill out your application and drop it in the Arts and Entertainment envelope.

So, for all you freshmen, sophomores, juniors, and seniors, try out writing for The Seahawk!

If you would prefer to make a telephone call, call 395-4761 and ask for Neal.

17 Men Still in Study Rooms

McCartney Plans to "Rethink" Booking

BY JOHN BRYAN
 Staff Writer

"We're working on it!" Residence Life Director Bill McCartney says in earnest of the overcrowding problem in campus housing.

The number of students desiring on-campus housing was much higher than predictions indicated, according to McCartney. For instance, 91% of the Freshman class requested housing as opposed to the 80% that is normally expected. Add to that a much larger class than was expected, and you can further see the problem. In addition, a larger number of returning students decided to return to their housing on campus.

All the explanations do not make it any better for those students that must live with the overcrowded conditions. According to McCartney, he and the rest of the Residence Life staff are doing everything they can to rectify the problem. Already, a number of students that have had to shack up in the study rooms have been moved into regular housing. Originally, 54 men and ten women were being housed two to a study room. Now only 17 men are being housed in study rooms due to Residence Life re-designating. One floor in Galloway Hall is half male and half female. In order to accomplish this, the shuffling of about 20 females to other housing on campus was required.

The remaining 17 men on campus that are still housed in study rooms will be moved into regular housing as soon as it becomes available. Residence Life is now going through the computers to determine those individuals that have become ineligible for rooms, such as those that have withdrawn from all their classes. Rooms are also expected to become available after the end of the class withdrawal period. Some students decide to drop out of school at this time. A $200 credit will be given to students who are still being housed in study rooms after fall break.

McCartney foresees some "rethinking" for next school year in regards to the booking of campus housing. One idea being tossed around right now is to make the deadline for guaranteeing rooms earlier.

United Carolina Bank Loans $400,000

Alumni Association Renovates Wise House

BY AMY BRENNAN
 News Editor

The UNCW Alumni Association has received a $400,000 loan from United Carolina Bank to help renovate the Wise House at 1713 Market St. When renovations are complete, the house will be the site of the UNCW Alumni Affairs Office.

Wise House was built in 1909. In 1916 it was purchased by Jessie Hargrave Kenan Wise, who wanted to be near her sister, Sarah Graham Kenan, who lived next door. Wise House was donated to UNCW in 1969 when Mrs. Wise died at the age of 98. Since that time, it has been virtually unused because the university lacked the money to renovate.

The house is now in phase I of renovations. This phase, which involves doing things like removing asbestos and adding handicapped accesses, is expected to be complete around October.

Even with the generous loan from UCB, additional funds will be needed to complete the finishing touches. The estimated cost for basic renovations is $717,000.

The Alumni Association has designed several different ways to raise money. Areas of the house are designated as memorials. The dollar figure assigned to each memorial represents the actual cost of renovating that particular space. For example, contributors may purchase one of nine mantels in the house as a memorial for $2,000.

It is also possible to pledge an amount of money to renovate a particular area within the house. The Friends of UNCW has pledged to renovate the staircase.

The Alumni Association is planning events for the near future. Riverfest weekend, Oct. 2-3, is family weekend for area alumni and family. A reception will be held at 5 p.m. on Friday at UNCW. A tour of Wise House will be given between 4 and 6 p.m. on Saturday.

For more information on registration for family weekend and other events, contact the Alumni Affairs Office at 395-3616. The 84-year-old house is located next door to the Kenan House where the chancellor lives. It is one of the largest old homes in Wilmington.

Alternatives! to Getting High

BY RENEE HILL
 Staff Writer

Alternatives!, the center for alcohol and drug abuse prevention, would like to welcome all new and returning students. Alternatives! will sponsor and co-sponsor a number of activities to provide students with information on alcohol, drugs, and alternative ways to get high. One example of a co-sponsored presentation will be "Hazing: A Greek Tragedy," presented by Eileen Stevens, September 8, 1993 at 8:00 p.m. in the University Center Ballroom. Also, activities such as residence presentations and information tables assist students with decision making on the effects of alcohol and drug use.

Alternatives! has been very active in educating the student body about natural highs. In keeping with past traditions, they will offer a similar, yet different variety of activities. First of all, the University Union, University Center, and residence halls will be filled with information tables filled with literature on alcohol and drug abuse. Also, students if you are sick and tired of looking at the same old sheets and pillow cases every night, or your roommate spilled Clorox on your red Chicago Bulls shirt, do not worry. Just haul all of those items down to the University Union lawn in October when Alternatives! will sponsor its annual tie-dye day. All drying materials and instructions will be provided, and students can bring as many items as they want.

Other examples of Alternatives! co-sponsored activities will include the LivWell fair and the Student Activities Volunteer fair, both which will take place in September. Moreover, Alternatives!, in conjunction with the office of campus recreation, will sponsor numerous outdoor activities, such as free sailing trips. "We extend an open invitation to students to participate in all of the upcoming events and we welcome your suggestions for guest speakers or other ideas," says Sandy Ermine, program developer.

Alternatives! has something for everyone. If you are an athlete, Alternatives! has coordinated alcohol and drug education sessions for you and all of your teammates. Also, residence hall assistants, if you think it would be a good idea to have a presentation on your floor, Alternatives! is awaiting your invitation. "Our residence hall presentations have been proven to be upbeat, informal, and very informative," says Errante. Alternatives! also coordinates the entire Speaking Greek program, says Diane Edwards, co-advisor of GAMMA, Greeks Advocating Mature Management of Alcohol.

Speaking Greek is a series of four programs that run each semester. The first program is scheduled to take place September 14, 1993 at 7:30 p.m. in the University Center Ballroom. Generous contributions from LivWell, Student Development Center, and the Leadership Center have helped to make Speaking Greek a big success. "We have improved every year, and look for continued success. Alternatives! two key components have been its peer educators and its resource collection located in the office for student use," says Edwards.

Hurricane season has arrived. Students who have never experienced a hurricane will ask, "What do we do if a hurricane hits here?" Those more seasoned hurricane survivors will answer, "We party!"

Hurricane partying will not occur on campus however. When the announcement comes that the beaches are being evacuated, UNCW will evacuate as well. All residence buildings will be locked and students will be encouraged to go home. Any students who does not have anywhere else to go may stay in the University Union or one of the five Red Cross shelters in New Hanover County.

A hurricane is a tropical cyclone with winds that reach a constant speed of 75 miles per hour or more. They are giant whirlwinds in which the air moves in a spiral around a relatively calm center, known as the eye.

Hurricanes form over large areas of open sea exposed to direct tropical sunlight for a week to ten days. They have four stages of development: The formative stage, immature stage, mature stage and the stage of decay.

UNCW has a hurricane preparedness team which will meet any time a hurricane watch is issued by the National Weather Service. A watch is issued if there is a possibility that a hurricane could strike within 36 hours.

The hurricane team, led by chairman Dick Scott, is composed of university officials, health care personnel, and campus police whose job it is to make sure all resident students are out of campus housing. When everyone is out, buildings will be locked so that no one can re-enter. Campus police chief Billy Dawson explained that combinations to residence halls and suites will be changed. The doors to campus apartments will be taped shut. If someone tries to open the door, the tape will break. This way, officers will know to check the apartment. "If you won't leave, we'll come in and arrest you," Dawson said. "It's for your own safety. We're not giving you a choice."

All students who leave the campus should bring their possessions to the dormitory. If UNCW is evacuated, the school will be flooded with calls from parents who are anxious to know where their kids are.

There are certain precautions that should be taken as soon as a hurricane watch is issued. Listen carefully to the radio for updates, bulletins, and special instructions. Be sure you have enough batteries for radios and flashlights in case the power goes out. Power outages are extremely common during hurricanes. Be sure your car has enough gas to get you to safety. Stock up on food that will not spoil and does not need cooking. Have a good supply of batteries, flashlights, candles, and prescription medicines. Tape windows to prevent shattering. Fill clean containers with drinking water. Fill bathtub with water for washing and flushing toilets.

A hurricane warning is issued when a hurricane is expected to hit within 24 hours. In the event of a warning: move valuables to upper floors, bring pets inside, use the phone only for emergencies, and stay inside.

If you have to evacuate, leave early. Classes are canceled four hours prior to adverse driving conditions, which are defined as the point when winds reach 40 miles per hour. Turn off water and electricity at main cut-off. Take small valuables, but travel light. Shelters will not take pets so be sure they are in a safe place with plenty of food and water. Looting sometimes occurs during evacuations so lock the house.

If you are staying at a shelter, take sleeping bags and pillows. Do not forget prescriptions and personal hygiene items. Bring some form of entertainment such as cards or books. Do not bring alcohol, pets, weapons, or extra food other than special dietary items.

While hurricanes can be exciting, they can also be devastating. Be prepared and do not take chances. If you have further questions, contact Dick Scott at 395-3067.

Students Response Favorable

Chick-Fil-A Opens in Hawk's Nest

BY KRISTY SHUMAKER
 Staff Writer

UNCW students have a new menu option this fall, thanks to the August 26 opening of Chick-fil-A in the Hawk's Nest.

Chick-fil-A opened as part of a joint venture with ARA Services, the nation's leader in food service management. Both companies are pursuing new growth opportunities on college and university campuses throughout the nation.

Chick-fil-A founder and chairman S. Truett Cathy said, "Bringing Chick-fil-A to the University of North Carolina at Wilmington is a natural step towards expanding our business into new areas."

Chick-fil-A is one of the largest privately-held restaurant chains and the third-largest chicken company in the nation. It was ranked the number one chicken chain in the 1988, 1990 and 1992 "America's Choice in Chains Consumer Satisfaction Survey."

Cathy added, "We are excited about working with ARA because of their long tradition of excellence in the foodservice industry."

ARA is a privately-held, international foodservice management company. ARA's Campus Dining Services division serves more than 200 million meals annually at more than 300 campuses nationwide.

"We are very pleased ARA is a partner in this venture with Chick-fil-A and delighted to add it to our roster of branded concepts," said Clarence Koester, president of ARA's Campus Dining Services Division. "The products and services Chick-fil-A offers match our goals of providing students with the highest quality of food available."

Chick-fil-A opened its first college restaurant at the Georgia Institute of Technology in 1992. UNCW is its 12th, adding to the company's nearly 500 mall-based and free-standing restaurants in 31 states.

As part of an overall strategy to make its products more accessible, Chick-fil-A plans to open 20 campus outlets nationally in 1993.

Chick-fil-A menu items include the original and char grilled chicken sandwiches, char grilled chicken salads, chicken nuggets, Waffle Potato Fries and lemonade.

Response to the UNCW opening has been very favorable so far, crew leader Les Rutt said Friday.

Junior Kelly McRee said, "I think it's great. I never even eat here on campus, but Chick-fil-A is my favorite place to eat when I go to the mall, so this was a nice surprise."

Sam Alexander, a sophomore, said, "I was impressed, because I only expected Chick-fil-A to be at the mall, and I always eat there when I go to the mall."

Freshman Elaine Duck said, "They're really have the best chicken."

Chick-fil-A is located in the Hawk's Nest in University Union and is open from 10 a.m. until 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

How does it feel to be a traditional freshman at UNCW?

Sometimes a picture says it all. And with deadline approaching shortly, this week it is going to have to.

I am writing in response to Neal Leeper's article about the comedy show this past Tuesday night featuring Jimmie Walker and Randy Kagan.

Leeper's article has shown a violation of one of the basic rules of journalism—reporting of the facts. Here are just a couple of blunders. Error number 1—if he would have bothered to go to the front and ask the person in charge of the tickets, he would have discovered that there were over 250, instead of the 150 people that he reported. Another error of reporting of the facts I found in the article was the fact that he said he was the only media member who covered the show. If he would have been backstage earlier, (which I might add a good journalist should do anyway) and just asked someone such as myself, or Alden Blake, or Frank Tascone, he would have discovered that in fact, the Star-News did an article in Monday's edition, and WECT, the Star-News, and Surf 107 all did work on the show.

Another thing about Leeper's article I found appalling was his one-sided criticism. In his article, it seemed like he had a field day on Jimmie Walker. Instead of commenting on Walker's material in the show, he thought the "hard news" dealt with Walker's attire. I guess I forgot that when you give a comedy performance you must have a three-piece suit on, or something like that. Give me a break!

The impression I got from talking to people about the show afterwards (wow, talking to people in attendance afterwards about a show - what a concept!) was that the two put on an equally good show, yet he could only criticize Walker. The word in journalism might have just reared its ugly head in this piece.

The sentiments I felt about this article were shared by others that I talked to about it, but I don't want to be too critical about the article. In fact there was something truthful I found in the article. At the end, he said that Carrot put would be here in the middle of November. Well, he was right about that, and a point of information for Leeper, tickets go on sale at the beginning of November!

Thank you,

We've Got To Teach Values Early

WASHINGTON—I don't want to convict the two 18-year-olds charged in the death of Michael Jordan's father. It'll be a while before we know whether the prosecutors can make the case they've been laying out to reporters.

But we already know enough about the two suspects, Larry Demery and Daniel Green, to wonder where such kids come from—and how we can stop producing more of them. And—please—let's not chalk it up to poverty.

The North Carolina authorities say the two boys (both indisputably poor) came upon James Jordan's $46,000 Lexus, with the 56-year-old owner asleep in the front seat, killed him and drove away in his car. Later, according to the police, they disposed of the body and later abandoned the car. They were identified after police were able to trace the calls the two allegedly made on the car phone.

These are not first offenders. Demery's record includes a string of some 14 burglaries, forgeries and larcenies, most of which never even came to trial. He was to have been tried this month for what, until the Jordan murder, had been his most serious charge: an October 1992 robbery in which he allegedly bashed a 61-year-old convenience store clerk over the head with a cinder block. Police say he was carrying a pistol at the time.

Green's career highlight came three years ago, when he took an ax to the head of a classmate—reportedly in a fight over a girl. The boy he assaulted spent a year in the hospital, several months of it in a coma. He still suffers seizures.

Green was sentenced to six years for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. He was paroled two months ago after serving two years.

Where do these kids come from? The judicial system, bad schools, inadequate parenting and, of course, poverty, will get their share of the blame. But there is something more.

There is a generational, ethical and cultural divide that keeps some of us from understanding the rest of us. Some of us (still the majority?) cannot imagine shooting anyone else except to protect our own life or that of a loved one—not for a million dollars, let alone for the short-term thrill of driving a Lexus. We cannot imagine smashing a cinder block over some woman's head in order to make off with $7 and a pocketful of cheap jewelry. We cannot imagine gunning down rivals, except in self-defense, and certainly we cannot imagine killing strangers because they have something we want.

And yet there are growing numbers of youngsters who will kill for leather jackets or a pair of sneakers. How do they get that way?

Maybe it's time to start asking how we on the civil side of the divide got to be the way we are. The two main reasons, I suspect, are that we were brought up that way and that it has worked for us.

We were taught sharing a civility so early and so thoroughly that our natural urges to selfishness and rage are kept in check. We were taught to view ourselves not merely as winners or losers but as moral creatures, for whom decent behavior is an important (though often inconvenient) value.

And it has worked. Probably the key reason we respect the person and property of others is the expectation—usually fulfilled—that our person and property will be respected.

What happens when these values aren't taught early, and when people grow up never feeling respected?

I am not saying—because I don't know—that the parents of the boys charged in the Jordan killing failed to give them the necessary moral foundation, or that they didn't learn respect because they weren't respected.

I'm not even arguing for leniency; I want kids like this off the street as much as anyone else.

But I also know that we can't cure the problem of escalating violence merely by trying to keep the already violent off the street. We have neither the hope of reforming them nor the prison space to incarcerate them forever. Even the death-penalty advocates don't want to kill all violent offenders. Sooner or later, most of the already violent will be back on the street, at least as dangerous as before.

If we are to save ourselves, we will have to learn how to turn off the spigot that keeps spewing new violence-prone youngsters. We've got to teach them early, as we were taught, the values that make civilized society possible, and we've got to show them that our values work.

Locking up those whose violence mocks our attitudes and beliefs may be necessary, but it's not enough. We've got to recreate ourselves.

America: A Mere Geographic Expression

ON INTERSTATE 5, NORTH OF SAN DIEGO—if you blink you may miss them. Don't blink. They are signs of the time.

They are large yellow signs of the sort that use black silhouettes—of falling rocks, leaping deer, playing children—to warn motorists. But the silhouettes on these signs are of a running family—a father, mother and small daughter. They represent illegal immigrants who risk, and sometimes lose, their lives, sprinting through the stream of speeding vehicles to evade a government checkpoint.

Here, where the surf rumbles a few hundred yards from the traffic's roar, where the Republic runs out of room and the horizon reminds Americans of Asian nations exporting economic challenges and challenging immigrants, here two of the nation's political preoccupations fuse: immigration and the North American Free Trade Agreement.

From the moment in the 18th century when national consciousness began emerging on the thinly settled eastern fringe of this continent, the animating question of American politics has been: What kind of people do we want to be? Uniquely blessed by the burden of choice—the French, for example, do not share our sense of perpetual becoming—we now face, with immigration and NAFTA, choices that will shape who we are.

In Sacramento and Washington, legislative hoppers are piled high with proposals, from national identity cards and increased border patrols to diminished entitlements for immigrants, to slow the flow of foreigners. Some are sound; almost all deserve debate and will get it, evidence that anxiety about immigration is now discussible, rather than dismissible as xenophobic primitivism. But all such proposals pale in significance when compared with NAFTA.

What impels immigrants to risk everything crossing the freeway—or the ocean it borders? The hope of betterment—in a word, jobs. Most immigrants would prefer to pursue a productive future at home. NAFTA will help potential immigrants to prosper at home—if NAFTA can be rescued from current irrationalities of American politics.

Pat Buchanan Republicans, a small but gingery group, oppose both immigration and NAFTA, an incoherence matched within the Democratic Party. Many Democrats are uneasy about acknowledging the principal incentive for immigrants—the availability of entry-level jobs in America—because many black leaders blame the disorderly lives of the inner city underclass on the supposed unavailability of such jobs. Furthermore, freer trade means, as freedom generally does, an uncertain future, and so is threatening to the timid, including some Democratic constituencies, such as organized labor.

Fear (Buchananites are timid nationalists—a phenomenon once considered a contradiction in terms) touches the immigration issue at every turn. Does immigration increase crime? Perhaps. But would denying, say, educational entitlements to the children of illegal immigrants serve domestic tranquility?

Because governments are objects of interests and conduits of passions, such as fear, much that governments do is mistaken. But most mistakes—spending here, taxing there—are correctable. However, if this moment for liberalized trade through NAFTA is missed, there will be a state of surrenders by the government—in the name of "compassion"—to timid interests demanding protection. And if immigration law is changed in a manner that codifies fear and hostility, America's identity will be altered.

Protection, candidate Clinton said, is just a fancy word for giving up. Giving up, that is, the nation's characteristic stance of confidence about competition and a fast unfolding future. And if immigration reform takes the form of a fearful flinching from infusions of ambitious and industrious newcomers, America will have gone far toward redefining itself as whiny and embattled.

The idea that most immigrants are drawn here, like iron fragments to a magnet, by welfare entitlements misses a huge and heartening truth.

What was once called "the Protestant ethic"—faith manifested in social advancement through individual striving—is coming in quantity from Catholic countries to the south.

Richard Rodriguez, an American writer of Mexican parentage, says that Tijuana, comparable in size to its neighbor, San Diego, is, in a sense, more American than San Diego. He means that Tijuana is rarer, less middle-aged, more as America used to be in its youthful boisterousness.

But America is more than an economy, more than an arena for individual striving for material betterment. It also—it primarily—is a culture and a fabric of civic traditions. Singapore booms, but is not "American."

In the flood tide of 19th-century American confidence, Walt Whitman proclaimed that America was more than a nation, it was a world. The justifiable concern about today's immigration is that America may be becoming less than a nation, a community lacking a clear cultural definition, a mere geographic expression.

Still, remember the reality represented by the silhouettes on the yellow signs. There is something unseen about an America that is frightened by families sprinting across the freeway to get to work. Such an America has much more to worry about than those families.

What Makes Us Go?

Last week I was promoting UNCW as a treasure island of potentialities, a place and a time in your life filled with resources to accomplish your fondest dreams.

This above, however, is only half the battle. The other half lies in understanding what makes you go; what forces are at work within you that aid or inhibit your working toward your potential. When I think about the way I operate and see others, I believe there are two fundamental forces within us that determine what we do.

The first is our needs. Lower animal's behavior is basically instinctive, i.e. basic needs that drive them in search for food, to protect themselves from predators and to procreate so that their species might continue. We of a higher order are still driven by our needs to determine much of our behavior whether we are aware of it or not. One of the driving needs of college students appears to be for acceptance by significant individuals and by a group. We need to understand that there is a positive and a negative aspect to our needs. We all want to be with people who affirm us. But at what price? The need for acceptance is sometimes the cause for getting involved in behaviors we normally would not choose such as drinking too much or submitting to sexual pressures or not confronting a roommate whose behavior makes life unpleasant. The need for acceptance often causes us to avoid upsetting anyone or standing up for our own rights and values.

Another need appears to be the need to avoid stress. No one likes to be uncomfortable and so we need to learn to deal with anxiety related to tests and real pressures that college life puts on us. But the desire not to be uncomfortable often causes us to stick with the same behaviors that we bring to the University even when those behaviors cause negative consequences. Avoiding stress causes some to steer away from taking classes that appear to be tough, to refuse to change our habits of nutrition or the way we study because they demand the stress of developing discipline. Students try to avoid the stress of seeking counseling for alcohol abuse or to avoid the stress of dealing with a problem in a relationship, for fear of possible change in that relationship or even its loss.

There are other needs that have similar negative aspects. The need to succeed is often accompanied by the fear of failure and a resulting lack of trying. A need for emotional security often is accompanied by choices not to get to know people who are very different from ourselves.

The second major force in charge of what we do are our values. We all have certain beliefs and ethical values that cause us to be honest, responsible, respected human beings but sometimes some of the negative dimensions of our needs result in a different set of values being truly in charge of what we do. Too many people are motivated by their ahead or to get the job done or to get what you want."

A productive set of values is derived from the needs of others the needs of the community, the needs of the earth—values which are eternal.

Before you can utilize the rich potential of your University life, you need to wake up and get in touch with the needs and values which are really in charge of your life. Such awareness is not achieved through thinking about what you believe in value but looking at your real behavior. Your behavior is the fruit of your needs and values and speaks the truth of you. Such awareness is the key to changes that may be needed so that you can find the truth so you can find the treasures that await you here at UNCW.

More Letters To The Editor

Dear Editor:

In my excitement of returning from Barbados I wrote an article in last week's Seahawk that I believe left some people wondering just what was going on there. Limited space in newspapers tends to do this. Without a doubt, the month I spent in Barbados was one of the greatest learning experiences I have ever had and for several reasons. The course I took under Dr. Loftfield was one of the best things that could have happened to me both academically as well as personally. Also, the exposure to a foreign culture was in itself a learning experience.

The field school in Barbados was a very learning experience for me as well as many others. I had previously taken Intro to Anthropology and learned a great deal about archaeology, but it was all text knowledge. The field school showed me how that knowledge was put to work, and it taught me a wealth of new knowledge. No amount of class lecture can show a person the delicate points of uncovering a 17th century pottery shard. Our academic experience was indeed a hard one. We (the students and faculty) worked on the site for 7 hours a day. The day started at 6:30 a.m. and ended at 3:00 p.m. Two meal breaks during that time allowed us a break of one and a half hours. Although we were not sitting in straight rows of desks listening to a monologue, Dr. Loftfield was constantly looking over our shoulders to make sure we were working and to offer every bit of assistance in answering questions or even physically showing us how if that is what it took. Because of this school, I have decided to become a field archaeologist upon my graduation in December.

Aside from the academic education this course offered, the contact with a very different culture was a whole learning experience by itself. The majority of this exposure was due to the fact that local islanders attending the University of the West Indies were also enrolled in the course. Also, the freedom in the late afternoons allowed us to do the things normal tourists would do which further exposed us to Bajan culture. As I began the process of attempting to get in on this program, I knew that the exposure to a foreign culture was the second reason for my going (right after the need for this class to graduate in Dec.).

I do apologize for leaving so many wondering what was going on in Barbados.

Alternatives! "Reaches Out"

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

Rape and sexual assault are not topics that many students feel comfortable talking about. Nonetheless, rape and related crimes do happen. Therefore, students need to be educated on ways to prevent these offenses. Last year, STAR, Student Team Against Rape, coordinated "Take Back the Night," a program held on campus in an effort to express awareness and support for sexual assault victims. This spring, the "Take Back the Night" program will be repeated on the UNC-Wilmington campus. Also, the program will be held in the Wilmington area this fall.

In an effort to continue support for the prevention of sexual assault, a new program called "Reach Out" has been developed. This program will operate out of the Alternatives! office located in University Union, room 104. The focus of "Reach Out" will be to heighten student's awareness of sexual assault through activities that inform them about the prevention of sexual assault and related crimes.

"We would like to recruit more males to educate men about sexual assault and assist the people in their lives who may have been victims," says Diane Edwards, coordinator of sexual assault programs and Alternatives!

If you are interested in helping with any of the upcoming events, just come by the Alternatives! office or contact Diane Edwards at 395-3683.

There are two paid peer educator positions available, as well as a need for volunteers. "We will collaborate closely with the campus police, Rape Crisis Center, and the Student Development Center to better inform students about sexual assault and related issues. Furthermore, we are developing a resource center which will be located in our office for student use," Edwards said.

Phil Smith

I'm baaaaaack!

While trying to decide what semi-cohesive, attention grabbing topic to begin the year off with I encountered quite a dilemma. Should I start that "How I Spent My Summer" bit again? Nope, that gets old. Should I, as a college senior, begin writing my memoirs? Nope, because someday I may become Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and win a big war and retire from the military and get SIX BIZILLION DOLLARS for my memoirs (well worth the wait). Or should I begin with an enchanting story about how I single-handedly saved the Earth from destruction? Nope, too boring.

So after what seemed like days of soul searching (actually it was while I was typing yesterday morning just minutes before my deadline) I decided to begin with something that was "tried and true," something that had proven itself worthy of NoBull Prize winning journalism. I looked back to my very first Seahawk column dated Sept. 1991 and entitled "Learn A Bookstore Lesson or Two." BINGO!!!

Based on this idea, and the purely coincidental Grand Reopening Gala Extravaganza over at the rip off shop, I decided to dedicate this issue to the founding principles of the column and henceforth RAG ON THE BOOKSTORE. Now don't get me wrong, I'm all for capitalism and growth and expansion and the general concept of Amway, but the Taj Mahal is in Las Vegas and I don't see the need for a duplicate here on campus. With doors as nice as those, they'll have to hire someone just to stand there and open them for you.

Now in honor of this momentous occasion, I have prepared for your singing enjoyment "Walking In A High-Priced Wonderland," by P. Smith, M. Chapman, and M. Caulder (I give credit where it's due!!).

Just hear those cash sales ringing, your money go jingling away. The sound of check books tearing your mom-n-dad's retirement away. Gone away is the bookstore, here to stay is the crook store; as we go along, stealing this song (nothing else, honest) walking in a High-Priced wonderland. Walking...in a High-Priced...Wonderrrrrraaaaand!! (Love those special effects.)

[Columnist Note: I know some nice ladies employed by the bookstore and this in no way reflects on them. It's more for the upper echelons with six or more digit incomes.]

In other news, thousands of displaced immigrants (i.e. Freshmen) mistaking the UNCW water tower for the Statue of Liberty, converged onto campus last week and demanded Seahawk citizenship. These "boat Freshmen" immediately claimed educational asylum and were granted permission to stay here until they receive a degree or go on Social Security, whichever comes first. The UNCW P.H.U.D. (Poor Housing and Underdevelopment Division) has crammed the new arrivals into the existing dorm space. Requests by several students to be housed at the New Hangover County Penitentiary were denied.

Have you seen/heard the latest from Rental Cop Central? They got new wheels!! From Chevrolet, it's the new 1993 Caprice Classic Deluxe GT Limited Edition complete with: heavy duty suspension for carrying those heavy loads, dual air conditioners, and a custom console which holds up to three cups of coffee and a half dozen donuts. Your tax and tuition money at work. By the way, this section is dedicated to WGNI morning show host Craig Thomas for having "Police officer donut day" last Tues. morning. I actually won a dozen glazed donuts for guessing the number of police officers at the four donut shops in Wilmington at that time. Thanks Craig, I may need those donuts to pacify a campus rental cop someday. Also thanks to "Sgt. Brown" for being in the Dunkin Donuts and causing me to win.

By the way, for those of you who are new to UNC-Wonderful or if this is the first time you've bothered to pick up a copy of The Seahawk, let me introduce myself. Hi, I'm Phil. I'll refer to some lines from my very first column (written back before we had paper and I had to etch it out on stone tablets) to explain my purpose here.

"Welcome back Seahawks! And welcome to what will hopefully be a recurrent, semi-cohesive, and quite possibly even interesting column found every other week (or so) in this same general section of The Seahawk. If you read carefully enough you may find it a tidbit comical. Or, on the other hand, you may even find it a tidbit offensive. (But this is only if you are an anal-retentive, manic-depressive, intellectually malnourished moron. Other than that, we should get along just fine.) I really don't care how you find it, though, just so you do find it; every other week (or so) right here in The Seahawk."

Well amigos, that about wraps things up for this exciting "Welcome Back" issue. Tune in next time for the return of the "Hats Off" and "Shoes Off" awards, as well as a possible top ten list. Enjoy this semester here at Seahawk High and remember; until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is a regular columnist for The Seahawk.

Johnny Quest Comes To The Mad Monk

D. Neal Leeper
Entertainment Editor

If you haven't ever seen Johnny Quest, now is your chance.

The Mad Monk is located in Marketplace Mall, next to Club New Zoo and Poindexter Records.

Review of "Smashing Pumpkins"

Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

Well, it is about time.

Finally, some two and a half years since the release of their stunning debut album Gish, the Smashing Pumpkins have unleashed the highly anticipated follow-up, Siamese Dream, onto the music scene. Gish was released on Caroline Records, and boy did it rock. I must have listened to it hundreds of times without ever getting bored. There was something about this Smashing Pumpkins band (who, by the way, hail from Chicago) that I really liked from the very first time I heard them. It took the until Siamese Dream to figure out why I had to listen to this band all the time.

Siamese Dream, released by Virgin Records, is everything its predecessor was and more. Much more. The album begins with Cherub Rock, the first single and video (which MTV is currently killing on Alternative Nation). It is energetic and catchy, with an eerie video to match. Next up is the not-so-quiet Quiet.

These first two songs really cranked, and kick the album off much in the same way that I am One and Siva did on Gish. Then comes Today, a very memorable song that perfectly displays the Pumpkins' chaotic nature as well as everything they've been through as a band for the past couple years.

They don't know whether they want to go out and kill themselves and end it all or be happy and celebrate life and love. It is all twisted together magically when lead singer Billy Corgan sighs, "Today is the greatest day I've ever known / Can't live for tomorrow / tomorrow's much too long."

Hummer and Rocket are the next two tracks, and both are standouts. Hummer is soothingly bummed out, while Rocket takes off thanks to an incredible guitar intro and solo by Corgan, who plays most of the guitars on the album. In fact, in many ways, Corgan is the Smashing Pumpkins. He writes almost all the music and sings virtually all the lead vocals, despite the fact that bassist D'arcy proved on Gish that she could sing.

But, one person cannot make a band as magnificent as this one. Part of what is so incredible about Siamese Dream is how crisp and complex it sounds. Producer Butch Vig should be given some kind of award for capturing the guitar sounds like he did. They are downright mesmerizing, perfectly complementing Corgan's mellow whispers and melancholy moans.

To pick the best moment of the album is a difficult task since the whole thing is so damn terrific. The moment of Utopia on Siamese Dream is probably captured on Soma, which features piano by Mike Mills of R.E.M. It has a beautifully sleepy beginning that creeps its way up to a powerful, passionate crescendo, not unlike James Addicott's epic Three Days.

The only complaint I have of Siamese Dream is that the lyric sheet included inside is virtually unreadable. I was saying earlier that there was something I liked about the Smashing Pumpkins more so than other groups. I discovered that, aside from the awesome songs and musicianship, I was won over by the band's honesty. Billy Corgan reveals the reason for all his anguish on the song Rocket when he sings, "I torch my soul to show the world that I am pure deep inside my heart."

Not since Led Zeppelin has a band blended together so chaotically, yet perfectly, as the Smashing Pumpkins. Those are big words of praise, but what else can I say when a band puts out an album as amazing as this one.

Overall Rating: A+ (Enough Said!)

Summer Movies In Review

Beth Capps
Movie Correspondent

Well, I don't know about you guys, but I had a very wet summer. No, I didn't spend it in the pool, at the beach, or even at the lake. I spent it in the movie theater. The summer of '93 saw the release of two tearjerkers, which is kind of good if you are like me and cry at the drop of a hat. At least Kleenex appreciates me now.

Let's see, for all of those out there who like a good romance story, there is Sleepless in Seattle, starring Meg Ryan and Tom Hanks. Nora Ephron wrote and directed this somewhat humorous romance story that revolves around two single people (Ryan and Hanks) whose paths end up crossing via radio waves.

Hanks is a widower of two years and has sunk into a pit of depression so low that his son, played by

Life In Wilmington

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Incoming Freshmen, welcome to both UNCW and the City of Wilmington. College is both an academic as well as social experience. Professors provide the academics, so I have decided to acquaint you with the social aspect of Wilmington.

My favorite social past time is live music. So, I'll begin with this. Many clubs in town provide live music, but Jacob's Run and The Mad Monk are probably the two most associated with it. Jacob's Run, located on Market Street in downtown Wilmington, hosts a variety of bands, but predominantly they are of the heavy metal/alternative/progressive type. The mad Monk has a wider variety, but is still a Rock 'n Roll club. The variety can be seen in the last weeks with bands like Dillon Fence, Steppenwolf, and a myriad of others. In my opinion though, local bands are where it is at. Here are a few names to watch for: All Tore Up (Hard-core), Emily's Porch, Neptune Bloom, and Two Headed Dawg (Alternative / Progressive), Billyclub Fest (a blend of alternative, grunge, and rap); finally, check out Shrine (a deadish style with good extended jamming songs). No matter what you are into, make sure you see Johnny Quest at the Monk once in your college career. That's just an all around good time.

If dancing is what you are into, then check out The New Zoo (which is right next door to the Mad Monk and Poindexter Records) or Metropolis (located downtown). The Zoo tends to be more of a typical dance club where everyone is dressed "to impress" and the music is very "MTVish." Metropolis, on the other hand, caters to a more diverse crowd and is much more casual. Go to Metropolis on a Monday night for "college night" and be ready to dance to a wide variety of music and above all else, be ready to sweat because it gets PACKED!

Fans of country and western music should check out the Yellow Rose Saloon or New Country (formally Country Music U.S.A.).

Sports fans, Katy's is a great place to shoot darts. Rack'em and Break Time are great for playing pool.

Other miscellaneous bars are W.T. Nix, Headgames, The Ice House, Barbary Coast, Tijuana Fats, Local's Only, and Red Dawgs. These places are geared toward drinking, but sometimes they'll do something special, like a band or bikini contest.

The only pointer I have is to ask people you know about these places. For those of you who are under the age of eighteen, I'd call the establishment first to make sure you can actually get in the front door. Other than that, I hope you have a good time and remember, DON'T DRINK AND DRIVE! (I know this sounds like something your mother would say, but I personally know four people who have died in drinking related driving accidents, not to mention the eight or ten others who have lost their licenses to D.W.I.'s!)

Dillon Fence In Review

Jack Cassidy
Contributing Writer

OK, I admit it. I was a little bit apprehensive.

I was standing in the parking lot of Marketplace Mall arguing with my roommate on the best way to gauge the impending performance of Dillon Fence. What makes one show better than another? What special qualities define a good show? Isn't a review really just one man's opinion arbitrarily related to his own specific perception of reality? And, perhaps most importantly, how much cheap beer could I drink and still remember the show the next day?

Well, after much philosophizing on these and other great mysteries, I came to a decision. The last few times I had seen Dillon Fence, I had been disappointed. They had seemed stale, without energy. The crowd had been lame and unimpressive. I figured I would watch the crowd and see their response this time. I was hoping for a show. I was hoping for some fun! I was hoping some women would talk to me! But, as I said, I was a little bit apprehensive.

Last Thursday night, Dillon Fence returned to the stage of Wilmington's MAD MONK. They were joined by two opening bands, Craven Melon out of Greenville S.C., and fellow Mammoth record mates and Kiwis extraordinaire, The Bats. Both bands were surprisingly good and worth a second look. By the time The Bats finished their set, the line outside was long. The places to stand were dwindling quickly. And, alas, all the cheap beer was gone.

Dillon Fence came on-stage to a packed house. Their opening song was a little weak and I feared for the worst. But, by the time they came around to the fourth song of the set, I knew my fears were all for naught. The pit started swirling and bouncing. The crowd started to respond. The next song, Sad Inheritance, turned the pit into a seething sea of arms and legs akimbo. A monster was being born.

This was the Dillon Fence I had hoped to see.

If you can judge a show by crowd response then this was a good show. Dillon Fence careened through old favorites such as Something for You and Daylight. They also gave a lot of play to songs from their new album Outside In, all the while whipping the crowd into a frenzy of hair and sweat.

During the course of the show the crowd responded to the music in several ways. My roommate enjoyed the show so much he was escorted out the door for stage diving. I also witnessed a young lady remove her shirt and swing it above her head while singing along. A young man jumped on stage during the final song, a great rendition of "Highway to Hell," and sang with the band. Yet another did a beautiful swan dive into the pit. They all, I assume, enjoyed the show.

Dillon Fence is well worth seeing again. You can catch them along with Craven Melon at the Kappa Alpha / Lambda Chi Alpha "Full Tilt" party coming up on September 11th. You can catch my roommate flinging himself about with reckless disregard for his body anytime he has had too much to drink. And, you can catch me on my way out the door, still hoping some woman somewhere will talk to me.

definite plus. This movie produces a few more tears than Sleepless in Seattle as it revolves around the friendship of a young orphan Jesse (Jason James Richter) and a captured whale, Willy (played by Keiko). Willy, an orca or killer whale, depending on whether or not you are a marine biology major, is captured by fishermen and sold to a water show. Jesse is caught vandalizing Willy's tank and as a punishment, he has to clean all the paint off. He becomes infatuated with Willy and befriends him through the whale-like music produced by his harmonica.

We then flow to the climax. The owner of the water park wants to kill Willy in order to obtain the ten million dollars in insurance money that Willy is worth. Willy charges his tank wall several times, bending one of the bolts and giving the owner a way of disposing of the whale without any suspicion.

Meanwhile, Jesse, who is distraught over Willy's behavior, has come to say good-bye to the whale.

He spots the owner's "right hand men" breaking off the bent bolt and runs to get help. Because the water is spilling out of the tank, Jesse and his friends have to get Willy to the nearest body of water, a good twenty to thirty minutes away, even in movie time. This launches the audience into an "edge-of-the-seater" mood as they ponder, "will they make it, or won't they?" I'm not telling, just so you'll go see the movie. Either that, or watch the Michael Jackson video. There you go folks, two movies that, I think you will enjoy. Just a word of advice though. Girls, keep plenty of Kleenex in hand.

And that's it for the summer movie summary.

Many positions available
SGA Kicks off year

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

The Student Government Association hit the ground running on Monday night. The initial session of the 1993-94 term kicked off with President Ziggy Nix's State of the University Address.

Nix stated there is a bond issue due to be voted on in the State Congress worth $310,000,000 to be put to use in the UNC school system and the public schools as well.

The monies allocated to UNCW would be used to build a new physical science laboratory and to add a wing to Bear Hall.

Nix stated the UNCW administration is for the bond's passing and he urges all students to let their representatives in Raleigh know how they feel.

Nix also stated there was a fee increase of $3 per student that went to SGA. That means there is an additional $24,000 in the SGA budget this year.

The first resolution of the year is in the works. Introduced by Sophomore Class President Chris Sudduth, the resolution will offer financial compensation for the students inconvenienced by the overbooking of dorm space by Housing and Residence Life.

"Students have lost 50% of the floor space they paid for," Sudduth explained.

Sudduth is to meet with William McCartney, the director of Housing and Residence Life today.

A number of SGA positions are unoccupied right now. Senior class representative Renee Elliot resigned and to fill her position any interested senior must go by the SGA Office (University Union Room 200) and ask for petition material.

Also available are positions on the University Union Board, a historian is needed for SGA, and people are needed to staff the polling stations for the upcoming elections.

There are five seats open for the Union Board. One seat is open for students from the following areas: a residence hall student, an off-campus undergraduate, a graduate student, a non-traditional undergraduate, and an international student.

A photographer is needed to take photos at SGA sponsored events for a SGA "yearbook."

If interested in any of the positions, contact SGA Vice-President Lyn Carney.

Election Board Chairman Alvin Phillips announced the Fall elections will be held September 14-15. Students will be able to vote at the University Center between 10 a.m.-2 p.m.; Randall Library 10 a.m.- 6 p.m.; and Wagoner Hall 11 a.m.- 1:45 p.m. and 4:30-6:45 p.m. The times are for both days.

Anyone interested in manning a polling station, contact Phillips in the SGA Office.

The positions of Junior Class Senator will be filled Monday. Mark Purrington and Crystal Frederick will be sworn in then.

Senator Lee Person was named "Senator of the Month" for the month of August. He was recognized for his efforts over the summer to get the Senator Notebooks organized and published and his work in the office.

Two programs still in the works that will be of interest to all are the Ride Share Board and the Roommate Placement Board. Both boards will be completed shortly.

The SGA bid a fond farewell to their liaison Lanita Hanson. Hanson left Tuesday for the position of Greek Life Coordinator at Texas A & M University.

The next SGA meeting will be Monday, 30 August, in University Union Room 100 at 6 p.m.

Hurricane Tracking Map

HOW TO TRACK A HURRICANE

Advances are numbered consecutively for each storm. Present location and intensity is described and expected movement is given. Tropical cyclone advisories are issued at six-hour intervals—at midnight, 6 a.m., noon, and 6 p.m., Eastern Daylight Time. Each message gives the name, center (eye) position, intensity, and forecast movement of the tropical cyclone.

Hurricane center positions are given by latitude (for example, 13.5 degrees North) and longitude (for example, 55.0 degrees West). When the storm moves within range of radar, center positions may also be given as statute miles and compass direction from a specified point.

* Tropical cyclones are not given names until they reach the storm stage—that is, rotary circulation, and constant winds over 38 miles per hour (33 knots).

When you receive a tropical cyclone advisory, note the advisory number, center position, intensity, and forecast direction of movement. Then mark the center position on the tracking chart. Because hurricanes change direction very quickly, you should listen more carefully to where the storm will go than where it has been.

See the color block at the bottom of the chart for an example of how to plot a storm from a position given in latitude and longitude.

Five lettermen returning

Volleyball Practice Underway

BY ERIK TOTTON
Sports Editor

Practice has begun for UNCW's women's volleyball team, which will begin its ninth season under head coach Kathy McDaniel.

UNCW finished 18-19 overall and 2-4 (4th place) in the Colonial Athletic Association last year. After seven consecutive winning seasons, last year marked the first time in McDaniel's nine year coaching stay at UNCW that the club dropped below the .500 mark.

With the loss of four key players, including UNCW's all time assist leader, Sheldon Plentovich and four-year letter winners Jennifer Jamieson and Leslie Knauss, McDaniel and the team have their work cut out for them.

"We have a more well-rounded team this year," says McDaniel. "Last year we were more offensive minded. We'll be better defensively this season."

The Lady Seahawks return five lettermen and two starters from last years club, including one of the league's top players in senior Amy Chilausk. Chilausk, from Durham, N.C., led the nation in blocks, and finished third in the CAA in kills and fourth in digs last year. Also returning to the club are senior Bobbi Pate, who finished fifth in the CAA in hitting percentage and placed second on the team in kills, and juniors Josie Youngblood, Debbie Taydus, and Leslie Noukelak.

"We'll be relying heavily on our two seniors, Amy and Bobbi, for their strong hitting abilities and leadership," states McDaniel. "Josie, Debbie and Leslie are also going to play key roles as juniors."

Also joining the club will be seven newcomers who will be looked to for immediate contributions. Janice Bates from Darien, Conn., joins the team after redshirting last season. Also coming aboard will be freshmen Ginger Moon (Gaithersburg, Md.), Jennifer McNeil (Pinebluff, N.C.), Kristie Cox (La Plata, Md.), Meg Gerlach (Burlington, N.C.), Katy Kurt (Los Angeles, Calif.), and Kristen Otto (Rockford, Ill.).

"This is probably one of the youngest teams we've ever had," says McDaniel. "But it's also one of our better skilled teams. All of our newcomers have excellent high school experience, so the transition should be smooth for them."

The Lady Seahawks begin their season with four road matches, including the season-opener against UNC Asheville in the UNC's Tournament in Chapel Hill, N.C. on Sept. 3. UNCW will make its home debut on Sept. 17 against Coastal Carolina.

Tales From The Dumpster

By Erik Totton
Sports Editor

Well it's almost fall and that means it's almost time for another of college America's great past times to begin - College Football! Being originally from Nebraska where football is close to religion, this is a time of year that is more than eagerly awaited by myself.

This year (like every other year) everybody seems to have their own pick for number one. I've heard everything from FSU to MSU to NCSU. It's all a little confusing to hear all the predictions from the Heisman to the Outland (who is Outland anyway) and everything in between. What I've done, to make things a little easier for the average fan, is to come up with MY picks and predictions without all that other mumbo jumbo. What I'm not going to do is list the top ten candidates in every individual award, just the top two - not very many people remember who gets second and nobody remembers third place. I'm also going to shorten the United Press and Associated Press top twenty-five polls to my very own top ten. If they are not in the top ten then they're not even within spitting distance of number one so they will have to wait until next season and try again. Also, so it won't seem like I'm just picking my favorites (and so I'll keep my job), I'm going to include the top ten picks of the editor we all know and love - Jim Clark.

To start things off we will begin with my choices for the various end of the season awards.

The Heisman Trophy

1. Calvin Jones, RB, Nebraska

2. Charlie Ward, QB, FSU

Outland Trophy - Int. Lineman

1. Rod Waldrop, NG, Arizona

2. Kevin Mitchell, NG, Syracuse

Lombardi Award - Lineman

1. Derrick Brooks, LB, FSU

2. Matt Dyson, LB, Michigan

Doak Walker Award - Jr/Sr Running Back

1. Calvin Jones, Nebraska

2. Marshall Falk, San Diego State

Larry O'Brien Award - Top Quarterback

1. Charlie Ward, FSU

2. Marvin Graves, Syracuse

Long Shot - Tommie Frazier, Nebraska

1. Derrick Brooks, FSU

2. Ron Wolford, Colorado

Thorpe Award - Defensive Back

1. Antonio Langham, Alabama

2. Aaron Glen, Texas A&M

With a shot just because he has a cool name - Shontae Peoples Michigan.

Now for the meat and potatoes of all this - the top ten, but let me first explain my number one pick so there will be no misunderstanding. My pick for number one is Nebraska, however, the fact that I'm from Nebraska had absolutely (maybe not absolutely) nothing to do with it. This is their year - their defense is quicker, they finally have a quality passer in sophomore QB Tommie Frazier, and their running back, Calvin Jones, is going to terrorize opponents running behind one of Nebraska's biggest lines ever on his way to the Heisman. I know, I know, some of you will say they haven't won a bowl game in five years but I'm here to tell you that was all just bad luck.

That's it, that's what you should use as your college football bible this season. If any of you fans have any of your own pre-season polls, college or pro, drop them by UU 205 and we'll put them in next issue. BB&T Donates To UNCW Leadership Program

BY LISA PRICE
Staff Writer

On Monday, Branch Banking and Trust (BB&T) donated a gift of $185,000 to UNCW to be primarily used towards the school's leadership program.

BB&T Senior Vice President John Lancaster presented the check to UNCW Chancellor James Leutze on top of a 35-foot tall platform located on the UNCW Ropes Challenge Course. Lancaster climbed the platform and challenged Leutze to climb up and retrieve the check. After retrieving the check, Chancellor Leutze followed Lancaster in gliding down the Zip Line, a rope hooked to the platform.

The majority of the money was a $150,000 fund given towards the Branch Banking and Trust Leadership Challenge. An amount of $10,000 will be used as a sponsor of the BB&T/Landfall Legends of Tennis tournament to help fund scholarships for student athletes at UNCW. The Chancellor's Club will receive an annual gift of $5,000 from the bank for the next five years.

In his introduction, Chancellor Leutze commended UNCW's Leadership Development Center, which is the only one of its kind at a North Carolina university. Since its establishment, over 45 students have participated in the EmERGE Leadership Program.

"In addition to being essential to career success, leadership skills apply in all walks of life," commented Leutze. "Leadership is not a singular thing. It requires testing your limits, taking risks, and using teamwork."

John Lancaster noted that it was not the first time he had appeared at the ropes course. "The majority of our employees have participated in this ropes challenge course," said Lancaster. "The results have been overwhelming in helping to build teamwork throughout our organization. BB&T is extremely excited to be a part of the UNCW ropes course."

Elikai Recognized

BY ANGELA CANTERBURY
Staff Writer

Not to offend any aspiring number crunchers or anybody already engaged in the activity, but accounting has rarely been considered an "inspirational" subject. That is, not until Dr. Faramarz Elikai hit the scene. An associate professor of Accounting at Cameron School of Business since 1986, Dr. Elikai has been recognized for his crafty classroom ways by just about everybody this year. The students in the Master of Business Administration program voted him Outstanding MBA Professor of the Year. The faculty of Cameron School voted and the Chancellor honored him with the Cameron School of Business Administration's Award for Teaching Excellence. He also received the same award from the UNCW Board of Trustees.

Dr. Elikai seemed a little embarrassed by all of the attention, but stressed how honored he was and said, "I have to thank the Board of Trustees, the administration, and my colleagues, especially at Cameron School of Business for their continuous support and encouragement." He also spoke of the MBA students and the MBA program with high esteem.

Dr. Elikai believes in teaching more than accounting. His philosophy is that it is his responsibility to truly prepare students for life and that means assisting them personally, professionally, and socially. Kim Thompson, as accounting student and assistant in the accounting office, said, "I think it's great that Dr. Elikai has been shown some appreciation. He definitely earned it."

So, if you find yourself in some hard-core accounting classes, you'll be lucky to get the guy who has been shown to share more than his wisdom on journal entries and profit maximizing. He may offer you some candy, which he keeps on hand, or he might tell you a joke, but he will definitely give you an education.

The Path of Hurricane Emily

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

Hurricane Emily unleashed her might against the Outer Banks on Tuesday. With sustained winds of 115 miles-per-hour and gusts clocked at 140, Emily battered the North Carolina coast.

In somewhat of a surprise, the storm followed the path forecasters with the National Hurricane Center in Coral Gables, Florida, predicted it would.

Due to a high pressure system to the north, Emily was kept on a tight course northward. She eventually found a weak spot in the high pressure ridge and broke through. That enabled the storm to move northeast and away from the Eastern Seaboard.

The storm may not have left without taking a life however. A report out of Norfolk, Virginia, says a teenager apparently drowned in the pounding surf stirred up by Emily.

The storm is not expected to attain landfall and should continue on a northeasterly course out into the north Atlantic. Once out to sea over the cold water, the storm will weaken.

As massive as Emily was and as close as she came to the Outer Banks, the eye of the storm did not cross over any land. Some reports had the eye less than five miles from shore.

Because the eye never reached land, the Cape Hatteras area was under constant assault. N.C. Highway 12, the only road along the Outer Banks, was flooded by midday Tuesday.

In Wilmington, the storm never materialized. The high temperature was 91 degrees under partly cloudy skies.

"It's kind of one of those adrenaline-pumping things. Everything is ready to go although you really hope you won't have to."

"If it weren't so fascinating to see what's happening, I'd be terrified."

National Student Exchange

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

Have you ever wondered what it would be like to visit another university for a semester, or even a whole year? Well, the Student Development Center has developed a program that allows you to do just that. The National Student Exchange program enables students from other universities to visit our campus for up to a year. Also, any current UNC-Wilmington student who wishes to visit another university can do so by contacting Kim Falcone, student coordinator, at the Student Activities Center. You must be a full-time student and have at least a 2.5 GPA.

As a result of the National Student Exchange program, UNCW has approximately a dozen new students visiting the campus. They come from schools such as: University of Virginia Islands, University of Maryland, Hawaii, Western Washington University, Rhode Island, Montana, Hunter College, Oklahoma State University, Bowling Green State, University at Bermadeno, and Southern Maine. Once these students arrive on the campus of UNCW, they are treated just like any other UNCW student. They are not transfer students, they simply visit our campus and return to their own after a semester or two. However, while they attend UNCW, they pay the tuition fees of their original school. If one of the aforementioned schools are located in your hometown, and you are feeling a little homesick, you can get in touch with any of the students in the program through the Student Activities Center.

"The students that participate in our National Student Exchange program love it. They love the beaches and have said that everyone is friendly and accepting of them. One of our biggest attractions has been our marine biology program," says Falcone. The National Student Exchange program has done very well in its existence at UNCW. As a matter of fact, "two students from the University of Massachusetts, along with two other students, have transferred to UNCW as a result of our program," says Falcone.

Prominent Student Dies

BY ERICA BRANDON

While vacationing in Panama with some friends, Michael Allan Howe lost his life. This tragic event occurred on July 14, 1993 during a rock climbing accident.

Howe was a junior here at UNCW. He was a marine biology major and president of the biology club. Under his leadership, the club was involved in a variety of campus and community projects. Howe also spent time in the biology department as a laboratory technician. He was involved in the research of fish and bottom-dwelling animals.

Donations have been made to a Marine Biology trust fund in Howe's name.

Children can learn if we let them

We seldom are more surprised than when our most piously professed beliefs prove to be true: that the pen is mightier than the sword, that a soft answer turneth away wrath, that the tortoise of perseverance defeats the hare of undeveloped natural advantage.

We're near the beginning of another school year, and the air will shortly be filled with professions of yet another abiding faith: All children, if properly taught, can learn.

We believe it. We write books on it, preach sermons on it, elect school board members and hire principals on it. I've written more columns on it than I can count.

So why, if we believe all children can learn, are we—am I—always so astonished when some unlikely children actually do?

Why is Marva Collins still such a pleasant surprise after all these years? The children at her Westside Prep in Chicago do learn, but isn't that what we say we expect them to do? Why did it startle me to discover that Jaime Escalante was teaching his poor East Los Angeles students advanced placement calculus? Or to learn that kids at Franklin High in inner-city Philadelphia are fencing at the near-Olympic level, or that children at the Chad School in Newark are building and flying radio-controlled airplanes?

I still get goose bumps reading about P.S. 27 in inner-city Indianapolis where dozens of children—the "Masters of Disaster," they called themselves—became outstanding chess players. I've been trying to chase down a report of a small town school (in Ohio, I believe) in which every last one of the children learned to ride a unicycle.

That report, many years old by now, has stayed on my mind because it strikes me as the very essence of what can happen when teachers really do believe—and make their children believe—that they can learn what they put their minds to learning.

I remember it for another reason. We talk a good deal these days about pedagogy, class organization, management arrangements—all the things that come under the rubric of reform and reorganization—as though they contain the answer to why so many of our children aren't learning. But the point of that Ohio (?) school wasn't the wonders of innovation. It was the power of expectation, of belief. The teachers expected the children would learn to ride unicycles and they communicated this expectation to the children, along with the assurance that they would give them as much time and support as it took.

It's what Jaime Escalante did with his poor Hispanic children at Garfield High, what Marva Collins continues to do in Chicago—what perhaps all successful teachers of "unlikely" children do. It begins with the belief that the children can learn.

Well, we believe it, don't we? It depends on whether you listen to what we say or watch what we do. Listen to us, and we will say with the straightest of faces that we believe all our children can learn.

But watch us, and what do we do? We give our children tests when they enter school so we can find out which are the smart ones with the capacity to learn and which the slow ones of whom we shouldn't make unjust demands. Sometimes the "test" is a simple eyeballing; we look at the children and "know" which ones will never learn much.

Nor is it just teachers who profess a faith they refuse to practice. Policy makers, education critics, legislators—even the children's own parents—will frequently make quite clear that certain children (usually those "crippled" by social handicaps) aren't expected to learn much. The result is lowered standards, watered-down instruction—and less learning.

It's worse than that. Even when individuals are willing to act on their all-children-can-learn faith, they often face institutional roadblocks. We know we ought to see someone else's success as proof that we can succeed, but too often we see it only as a rebuke to our unsuccess. Those who should be role models become enemies.

It's probably too much to ask—even most ministers seem reluctant to ask their congregations to live as though they believe the faith they profess. But wouldn't it be nice if all of us—teachers, parents, politicians, business leaders, journalists—would pledge just for the next semester to act as though we really do believe all our children can learn?

It just might mark the beginning of and academic revival, a reaffirmation of the faith we all confess and the literal salvation of our nation.

A special thanks to UNCW's EOC

The events of the early part of this week regarding that tropical system in the Atlantic show us how little control we really have over things in our life. No one knew, even the vaunted Seahawk staff, what Emily was going to do, how strong she was going to get, and when she was going to do anything.

Many people were heard complaining that the university needs to either send the students home on Monday or to tell us to stay, but tell us something.

The Emergency Operations Committee met Monday afternoon to discuss what the university should do. UNCW relies on the New Hanover County officials for information and initiative. If Wrightsville Beach is deemed to be in imminent danger, the university sees that as a threat to the school. When the County officials decided Monday afternoon not to evacuate the Wrightsville Beach community, the university decided not to evacuate the university.

The university is not going to force the County's hand by evacuating when no other County community is. That would undermine the authority of the County and may cause a sense of panic the area.

What the Emergency Operations Committee did was the right thing. As it turned out, they were right in not ordering an evacuation of the school. Temperatures on campus Tuesday were in the 90s and there were few clouds in the sky by afternoon.

The personnel on the Emergency Operations Committee have a difficult job to perform, and they know that. Emergency Operations Coordinator Dick Scott and his staff are to be commended for their job this past week.

An evacuation of any kind would have been difficult, regardless of the status of the sun in the sky. By waiting, the Emergency Operations Committee did us all a favor.

Thank you.

Emily: a clue to life in Wilmington

For those of you who haven't been in Wilmington during a weather storm, here are a few tips to making life the next time around easier.

—There will be no bread in the Cape Fear region five minutes after a weather advisory is announced. Some meteorologists believe the vortex of swirling clouds around the low pressure system has a magnetic effect on the bands that close the wrapper. It has been picked up on radar a number of times, but the Air Force has confiscated all recordings of it and are studying them in Hangar 10 in Arizona.

—There will be no Benic Weenies either. (It usually takes 15 minutes for the cems to disappear, probably due to the weight of the cans.)

—Everybody is a meteorologist. "The storm is going to strike Wilmington with the strongest winds on record" or "This storm will go back out to sea and never to be heard from again." No one knows, not even the folks at the Weather Channel, what a hurricane is going to do. Predictions can be made by any numskull. Always stay tuned to local media.

—Instead of going out and buying water, save a few bucks by doing this: Go out and buy a couple 2 or 3-liter soft drinks. When you finish the contents, wash them out and save them, cap and all. So, when the next weather advisory is issued, fill the bottles with water and save them for when you need them.

—Buy some batteries for your radio. They will come in handy.

Weather is something we cannot control, unless you believe the government is seeding clouds, so don't worry about things unnecessarily. Be prepared, informed, and patient.

UNCW Chancellor James R. Leutze

Dear Colleagues and Students:

I was dismayed, as I know you were, that the Ku Klux Klan targeted Wilmington for a march and rally recently. As the university and its employees seek to play a responsible role within the community, we must recognize the importance of promoting racial understanding and valuing diversity.

While we respect the right to peaceful assembly, we must not lose sight of our need to coexist peacefully, productively, and collaboratively with those of other races or from other cultures.

I strongly believe that we here at UNCW Wilmington must seek a common ground and realize that the fulfillment of our individual interests can only be found when the interests of all are addressed. This requires conscious thought and effort by each of us—as illustrated by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. when he wrote:

Like life, racial understanding is not something that we find but something that we must create. And so the ability of Negroes and whites to work together, to understand each other, will not be found ready made; it must be created by the fact of contact...

Somewhere along the way the two must join together; black and white together, we shall overcome, and I still believe it.

We must remain vigilant to guard against the resurgence of hatred, division, distrust, and racism—and show, by our own words and actions, our personal commitment to promoting racial understanding and valuing diversity at UNCW Wilmington and throughout our community.

With all best wishes,

James R. Leutze

Private vs. Public schools, California-style

SAN DIEGO--In November, California, frequent incubator of America's future, will conduct a vote eclipsing in importance last year's banal presidential choice. If passed, Proposition 174 will offer parents vouchers worth at least half the cost of educating a child in a public school (currently $5,200) and redeemable as private school tuition. If the chosen school costs less than $2,600, the saving can be used for subsequent grades, or for college.

Private schools often get better results (gauged by test scores and graduation rates) than public schools, but cost less per pupil than public schools. So the larger the number of Californians who would use Proposition 174 vouchers to choose private schools, the more the state would save. Furthermore, Proposition 174 would spur creation of new schools at a time when California's burgeoning school-age population requires (if class sizes are to be maintained) creation of a 600-pupil every day for 10 years.

Public school unions constantly fault taxpayers for "shortchanging children." Actually, inflation-adjusted public education spending per pupil has about doubled every 20 years since 1945. San Diego teachers' salaries doubled in the last decade and top administrators average $90,000 a year, and in California's bureaucratic education system, non-teachers outnumber teachers.

Many who supported forced busing to produce racial balance were liberals with children in private schools; many who oppose making school choice available to all parents are themselves parents choosing private schools (The Clintons, for example). Nationally, about half of all urban public school teachers with school-age children send their children to private schools. If the (data is being compiled) the percentage of California public school teachers sending their children away from public schools is higher than the percentage of the general population doing so, supporters of Proposition 174 can ask: What do teachers know about the public schools that voters ought to bear in mind in November?

Opponents of Proposition 174 already have sunk to what can best be called boring hysteria. For example, Kathleen Brown, the Democrats' probable gubernatorial nominee, warns darkly that a "witches' coven" is talking about starting a school funded by Proposition 174 vouchers. And a hysteria-monger on the side of the California Teachers' Association, the teachers' union, says that in private schools, "A science course could be teaching kids how to make Molotov cocktails."

Actually, what the CTA calls "unregulated and unaccountable voucher schools" would not be immune from state regulation, and would be accountable to empowered parents who could remove their children from schools with silly curricula. In contrast, under public-education's existing semimonopoly, many parents have no alternative to public schools teaching sexual "responsibility" (as defined by condom-pushing "experts"), environmental "responsibility" (as defined by people who think Al Gore is a scientist) and multicultural "sensitivity" (as defined by whatever racial, sexual or ethnic faction has captured the curriculum).

The CTA's president, Del Weber, warns that private school teachers are subject to fewer credentialing requirements than public school teachers. Ken Khachigian, strategist for the pro-174 campaign, replies that the private school system produces lower results with its higher credentials, so in what sense are they "higher"?

The National Education Association, the CTA's national counterpart, is the nation's largest and most politically aggressive union. At last year's Democratic convention, about one-eighth of the delegates were NEA members. The CTA tried to block a vote on Proposition 174 because "there are some proposals that are so evil that they should never even be presented to the voters." This autumn the CTA will spend lavishly to spread hysteria—witches' covens, Molotov cocktails, whatever—about the "evil" of parental choice.

Although the NEA claims not to know how much state and local education like the CTA spend on politics, Forbes magazine, extrapolating from spending in four representative states, estimates that at least $16 million is spent annually. Almost that much may be spent in California in support of what Forbes calls the NEA's "Brezhnev doctrine"—socialism, in the form of government control of education, cannot be rolled back anywhere.

But Californians have noticed the perverse correlation—increasing NEA arrogance and increasing spending on public education coinciding with a decline in educational quality. And Californians can take law-making into their own hands.

In 1978 they slashed property taxes with Proposition 13, thereby presaging the 1980 election results. The NEA is terrified that Proposition 174, another blow against governments' self-aggrandizing grip on society, may have a similar national resonance.

Khachigian thinks that if his side is outspent by "only" three-one, Proposition 174 will pass. The NEA asserts that permitting parental choice will devastate public education. Khachigian can rest his case on that assertion, the NEA's damning assessment of public education.

Bob Haywood

Innerpeace key to success

There is always so much going on in our lives. Full class schedules, our social lives, attending meetings, doing homework—all focus our attention and energy on the world that surrounds us. Class schedules control us. Opinions of our friends, real or imagined, influence us. Parents bug us. All of these forces outside of ourselves have so much control over how we function and we frequently lose sense of ourselves and surrender our lives to the forces that surround us, pulling us first one way then another. My calendar seems to have almost demonic control of my daily life and when I let external forces fill it up, I sometimes give away the spaces in my day where I nourish my own inner and truer self.

All of us have two polarities which mark the parameters of our lives. One is our outer world and the other our deeply significant inner world and our well-being is derived from moving back and forth with some semblance of balance between these two polarities.

There are two problems that make this kind of inner work difficult for any of us, particularly young adults of college age. First, the incredible busyness of our lives makes it easy to not be aware of or ignore the inner work we need to be doing until there is some kind of crisis in our lives.

The second problem is that given all the noise of our outer world, maintaining a focus on our inner life demands discipline. If you are going to lose weight, you have to maintain a discipline about eating. If you are going to get in shape you are going to have to maintain a discipline about exercise. If you are going to attend to your inner needs you are going to have to identify the value you need to cultivate and then develop the discipline appropriate to maintaining consistency in your efforts to work on that issue.

A discipline important to me is that of solitude and silence, moments in each of my days in which I can seek to be still, turn off external distractions and be present to hear the voice that would speak from within rather than all the demands that seem to shout from outside. If you want to do well as a student, you have to develop a study discipline not motivated by the prevailing values of simply getting by, but by internal values grounded in your own drive for academic success. Only a disciplined approach to study will allow you to say no to some of the pleasant distractions that surround you. If you want to feel better about yourself, then you may need to engage in the discipline of regular counseling or set some goals about being assertive and outgoing and engage in the discipline of daily reflection.

One useful tool for doing inner work is the discipline of journal writing. Buy a book with empty pages or a nice notebook and discipline yourself to reflect on what is going on within you as you deal with this busy, busy world of UNCW. Such writing increases your awareness of yourself and your needs and values in a way that can be useful in your desire to grow. Whatever you choose as means to do what you need to do, remember that it is the inner work that is crucial to your long term satisfaction with life.

Lisa Kellogg's Buddy What to do, what to do?

This is, of course, not my week to write but considering the most recent climatological events in the region I decided to join the thousands of TV stations, radio stations, newspapers, and barber shop pundits in providing coverage of "Hurricane Emily 1993."

Now I have been around here long enough to know that many of you are perhaps saying to yourselves right now, "What hurricane?" Yes friends, a category 3 hurricane almost huffed and puffed and blew the school down last Tuesday. See, that's why everyone was walking around looking at the sky as well as why so many seats were empty (surf WAS up) in my Microbiology class. Even though the storm passed us up for the Outer Banks, it will live on in our memories as well as on these pages of The Seahawk.

And now, without further delay, I present for your reading enjoyment the Top Five Things To Do When A Hurricane Passes By, by NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith.

#5. Drive inland and purchase large amounts of plywood, tape, and flashlight batteries to hawk in front of an empty Lowe's. By golly, if folks are going to die in a hurricane, they want to have plenty of plywood, tape, and flashlight batteries on hand.

#4. Walk around campus and read silly fraternity messages on sidewalks. (Alternate activity: attend rush event with fraternity that DOES NOT put sill chalk messages on the sidewalk.)

#3. Invite friends over for the first episode of the Late Show With

David Letterman and see a REAL TOP TEN LIST.

#2. Call up local radio stations and pretend to be a school official announcing that classes have been canceled.

#1. Head down to Krispy Kreme and help Campus Police board up the windows.

These are just a few of the many things one can occupy himself with while a hurricane approaches. I spent most of the time bouncing between The Weather Channel and rebroadcasts of the Clarence Thomas Senate Confirmation hearings. Speaking of The Weather Channel, wouldn't they make more money if they went Pay-Per-View? Can't you just hear it now... "Coming up next on The Weather Channel, those 5:00 p.m. hurricane coordinates and our first landfall predictions. You get all this and a free copy of Phil Smith's Top Five Things To Do When A Hurricane Passes By for only $19.95 ($199.95 day of hurricane).

Well friends, this brings to a close this short but none the less Special Hurricane Edition. Tune in next time when I may present my plans for an official "UNCW Rental Cop Tracking Map." It will come with complete instructions on how to track and plot the positions of any rental unit in the area. The guide will include special information such as local donut shop hours as well as usual "unkle times" for the officers. No student should be without one!!

Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

The Psyclone Rangers, composed of Jonathan Valania, lead singer guy Scot Dantzer, rawk geetar/more hollerin' P.R. Behler, bass frequencies/lithium/hollerin' Jamie Knerr, drums and percussion, combined forces with the mighty Dave Ogilvie (Skinny Puppy) under the watchful eye (and pocketbook) of Dave Allen to create the low-fi, tow-tappin', noisy platter of pure pop mayhem known as Feel Nice.

The Psyclone Rangers will be performing at The Mad Monk on Tuesday, September 7th with The Reverend Horton Heat.

Quest Returns

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Last Thursday, Johnny Quest played at The Mad Monk. I got a chance to go backstage and talk to singer Joe Farmer before the show and he filled me in on why Quest has not played in six months.

Due to a major auto accident in March, Quest had to take time off to both heal and get equipment to play. One night, the band was returning from a show in Atlanta in their van and the driver fell asleep at the wheel. Well, that caused the van to fly off the side of the road. It flipped seven or so times and in the process it threw three of the six people in the van out. A trucker stopped to help and they managed to drag the other three out of the van just before it erupted in flames. Needless to say, the van and the band's equipment were totaled.

Now, six months later, they have returned to the stage and played for the first time since the accident. And despite the long recovery pe-rior, the accident is still part of the band. The drummer still has a cast on his leg because it was broken fifty (yes, that's FIFTY, not a typo) times and he still uses a cane to help him to get around.

Also, different about the band is their bassist. Tom Nills plays bass for Quest now. Not only is it tremendous to come back from a wreck of that magnitude but to also get a new bassist ready for shows.

a trucker stopped to help and they managed to drag the other three out of the van just before it erupted in flames..

Upon joining the band, Tom had to learn 22 songs. Also, live performance is much different than playing in a studio or a rehearsal room and in my opinion, Tom appeared to be on the ball and right with the band.

The show last Thursday was exceptional. It didn't even seem like much had changed except for one face. The band was just as pumped up and energetic as ever, if not more so. They played everything. They played Quest classics like "Lady Cop" and "The Heisman" (my personal favorite). They played stuff off their album Ten Million Summers. They even gave us a few new tunes like "Number 9." Being their first show in six months, I was utterly amazed at how long they played. I was also glad to hear from Joe before the show that they are booked solid. They have three shows a week for some time continuing in the future.

As for the future of Johnny Quest, like I said, they're booked. They plan to come to the Monk again in October around (or maybe even on) Halloween. Joe was also saying that they would like to get into the studio this fall (or winter) and if all goes well, they will hopefully have a new record out this coming spring/summer.

Streams, Dreams, and Dancing Queens

Jack Casaldi
Entertainment Writer

On Monday's nights, a snake slithers into Bessie's belly and resides there warm and comfortable until the wee hours of the night. It is the garden snake of our youth, the one that surprised us as we were running through the backyard on that warm summer day. It is a friendly snake that we remember fondly now, laughing at ourselves and the innocence of our childhood.

The snake represents that period of our lives when neighborhood friends and outdoor games and Saturdays spent rollerskating were most important. We might say that the snake was the background music of our early years. We might, grinning sheepishly, admit that maybe, just maybe, we miss the snake a little because of the memories its music represents. We might even like to see the snake again, and if we did, we would call it by name. We would call it DISCO.

Pay my dollar at the door, man. Descend into the twilight zone. Its a smoky, hazy environment filled with pleasantly freaky kooks. Listen to the DJ spin the vinyl of yesterday your way, groove thing. Slide me a pint this way, barkeep and let me laugh quietly to myself. I'm here to enjoy the ride.

A thumping beat, a mirrored ball, a kaleidoscope of colors to overwhelm the membrane, I am beside a young lass dressed in polyester and bell bottoms.

A waka-waka riff echoes through the air, bringing to mind seventh grade anti-drug movies.

I am dancing, shake your groove thing....

The beer menu goes on forever, but the music only lasts so long. By the end of the night, I am finished. I can go no more. I have been super freaky. I have danced to that funky music.... "Stayin' Alive, just Stayin' Alive...."

I stumble up the stairs, tire and groggy. The flashing lights and smoke give way to the twinkling stars. I breathe deeply semi-clean air and smile satisfied. I'm sure I will be back next Monday. This lost soul will find a way to ask more questions. But, for now, I'm on my way out the door, floating silently above a sea of polyester and talking to the stairs for some answers.

The Amateurs Shake Bones

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Well, hello there again, music fans. This past week has been great for live music. Not only did Johnny Quest play on Thursday, but The Amateurs played The Mad Monk on Saturday. For those of you who have not heard of The Amateurs (if there are actually any of you out there) they are a great reggae band that plays here in Wilmington quite often.

As with all good reggae music, it is a good chance to go and shake your bones on the dance floor. Luckily for me, I got to do my dancing with a pair of beautiful women. Nevertheless, The Amateurs put on a great show.

They play everything from Amateur originals to reggae classics from Peter Tosh and others. When I got there, shortly after eleven o'clock, they were already on stage playing and had a handful of people dancing. After five or six songs, they took a short break. It was at this time that a lot more people showed up. So, during their next set, the whole place was dancing. All in all, I had a blast. The Amateurs were great and they really knew how to get us going.

Letterman is BACK!

D. Neal Leeper
Entertainment Editor

On Monday, August 30, 1993, at 11:30 PM on your local CBS affiliate, the new television series "Late Show with David Letterman" was broadcast for the first time to an audience of millions.

David Letterman, whose show "Late Night with David Letterman" carried the 12:35 am time slot on NBC, decided to part with the network after negotiations for the earlier (11:30) time slot failed. David Letterman wished to have the 11:30 time slot after Johnny Carson retired, but instead of switching Letterman to the new time slot, NBC hired Jay Leno to fill Carson's shoes. Needless to say, Letterman did not care too much for this. Since his contract expired this year and negotiations failed, CBS grabbed the late night guru with all their might.

In April of 1993, a big debate erupted concerning the location of the new show. Certain CBS representatives wanted Letterman to move his operations from New York City to Los Angeles, but in the end, Letterman refused. The purchase of the run down Ed Sullivan theater marked the beginning stages of the new Letterman show. Construction workers have literally worked around the clock for the past five months in preparation for the new television show. If you saw the first show on Monday night, you would have seen the brilliant work accomplished in such a short time.

As the eleven thirty time slot was a good fit for my 27 inch RCA surround sound stereo monitor and Technics seven speaker surround system (Yes, I opened a Sears Charge Plus account a few months ago and went crazy). Sure enough, the new and improved credits rolled with the large, flashing "CBS Surround Sound (Where Available)" on the bottom of the screen. The show was much better than what was offered on NBC and the visuals were very impressive.

The crowd went WILD! Letterman walks out with his impressive grin, pressed suit with his incredible grin and smirk. The Ed Sullivan theater has two levels, which looks (I don't know for sure) like it would hold in the upwards of six hundred people. Everyone was crazy and the applause lasted for a while. Of course, as expected, the jokes poured on against NBC and General Electric.

Reference was also given to the woman that keeps breaking into Letterman's home. Letterman comments, "You remember that woman that keeps breaking into my house? Well, she's doing it again, but now she's doing it a hour earlier."

Oh well, I thought that was pretty clever. The introduction led to the all new "CBS Orchestra," which consists of Paul Shaffer and the "World's Most Dangerous Band." Paul was wearing the typical "Shaffer" wear: totally tacky gear that he is known for. There is a bright side to Paul's wardrobe though. At least he is known for taking safe fashion tips from my good friend Jimmy Walker. (I guess sweat pants and flip-flops wouldn't look good on national television. It is a good enough for famous UNCW guests, I guess.)

The new "Top-Ten" list was presented with the all new "Top-Ten" list graphic that looked great. It also sounded great in Dolby Surround Sound.

The first guest on the show was everyone's good friend Bill Murray.

Murray made several introductions on the set and then continued to act upon his What About Bob? imitation. After giving Letterman a "Hello — My Name Is:" name tag in order to make him more sure of himself on the first show of the year, he then spray painted the bottom of the new desk with "DAVE."

"You remember that woman that keeps breaking into my house? Well, she's doing it again, but now she's doing it a hour earlier."

A couple other skits and silly things happened that Dave is known for.

And then, Billy Joel performed a song off his new album and talked about his life for the past couple months. Anyway, Joel commented that he had been asked to perform in a "Jam Session" with Bill Clinton. Joel quickly denied the invitation because he thought that performing with Clinton would be everything BUT a "Jam Session." You figure.

And with that, the show was over. Out of time. The End. Game Over. I enjoyed the show tremendously, but for those of you out there who are capable of receiving "Surround Sound," you might have noticed some glitches and weird reflections of sound against the Ed Sullivan Theater walls. But, visually, the show was GREAT!

Remember, David Letterman is now on CBS at 11:30 PM. Check it out!

Until next time!

Chancellor's Thoughts on KKK...

Affairs, and the Chancellor's Office.

Students traveling to class via bicycle this fall should have a quicker and less hazardous trip thanks to new bike paths added to campus this summer.

The paths, which were completed as school began, are primarily located on both sides of Price Drive and on one side of Hamilton Drive. Price Drive begins off Reigel Road near the arms and winds through campus, ending behind the bookstore at Reigel Road. Hamilton Drive is located between the athletic field and the tennis courts near Trask Coliseum and connects with Reigel Road.

The bike paths were funded by year long allowance from the Business Affairs Office. The location of the paths was determined by a division of the Business Affairs Office, Project Design and Management, Student

The paths were created by adding four feet of pavement to existing roads and painting solid white lines to offset the paths from the road.

There are existing bike paths on Hurst Drive, Cahill Drive, Reynolds Drive, and short sections of Wagoner Drive and Street C.

Another bonus for bicyclists this fall is the air station located behind the bookstore next to the loading dock. The air station is the only one on campus. Students can fill up their bicycle tires free of charge.

The air station was installed by the bookstore last semester and is virtually free of charge to the university because it runs off the bookstore's air conditioning unit.

University police remind students that bicycle registration is mandatory and free of charge. Take your bike to the campus police station to have it registered.

Some Students Still Temping

Housing and Residence Life projects to have students currently living in dormitory study lounges by the end of this month, Director Bill McCartney said Tuesday.

The university overshot its projections for incoming students this semester, forcing some to be temporarily housed in dormitory study lounges. McCartney said the university originally anticipated a smaller freshman class than normal, at about 1,250 students, but about 1,428 showed up.

Incoming students who put down a deposit prior to May 15 were guaranteed housing. At the same time, housing administration worked harder to retain returning students. Room sign-up was held earlier this year, and improvements such as re carpeting of hallways were made.

"As a result," McCartney said, "we were squeezed tighter than we would have liked to have been." Roughly 95 students were put in study rooms in Belk, Galloway, Graham, and Hewlett Halls, and in rooms with residence advisors.

McCartney said in order to house the additional students, the university purchased bunk beds, mattresses and desks and rented partition wall units, at a combined cost of more than $50,000.

"We have tried very hard to make them as accommodating as possible," McCartney said. "In the past, we have tripled students in bedrooms. This year, there is no third person in any of the bedrooms."

"However," McCartney said, "the suite study rooms are small and lack privacy. And the study lounges in Galloway, while they are bigger than the traditional dorm rooms, have no closets and no phones. Still, some of the students like them well enough that they have asked to stay all year."

Alana Harris, a freshman, was initially housed with a residence assistant in Belk Hall and later moved to a permanent space in another hall. "It wasn't what I expected when I came to UNCW," Harris said. "But I don't want to knock temporary housing either. I had it pretty good. In the study rooms, some of the lights didn't work and there weren't enough electrical outlets. Those people were told they couldn't bring everything, just the necessities. But my roommate told me I could bring as much as I wanted. I wish I could've stayed there."

To begin placing students in permanent spaces, Housing and Residence Life canceled housing for all students who had not shown up by Aug. 19. Housing administrators also allowed students to break their housing contracts. McCartney said all but a handful of the women have since been placed in permanent housing, and only 13 out of 54 men remain in suite study rooms.

Housing and Residence Life is giving relocated students their choice of available space and providing a moving service at the university's expense. In addition, any student who has a temporary roommate will receive a $200 credit on his or her housing account.

As for room change, which rolls around this week, McCartney said, "It's not going to be simple this year. People will have to be creative and persistent."

Cross Country Begins

BY ERIK TOTTEN
Sports Editor

Second-year coach Jim Sprecher has the UNCW cross-country program set for another promising season. After losing just two seniors from last year's squad, Amy Jackson for the women and Sam Bobbitt for the men, and with juniors Heather Fenton and Tim Cox ready to move up to the next level the Seahawks appear to be in store for a promising season.

Jackson and Bobbitt will be sorely missed. Jackson captured All CAA honors for two straight seasons in cross country. In addition, Jackson captured CAA titles in the 10,000 and the 5000 meters and became UNCW's first NCAA provisional qualifier. Jackson also earned All-East Coast honors and was named UNCW's Athlete-of-the-Year and the school's top scholar athlete. Bobbitt was also a two-time all CAA performer in cross country and set school records in the 1500, 3000, and the 5000 meters in track last season. Bobbitt also earned All-East Coast honors by finishing fourth in the 3000 at the ICAA Indoor Championships.

Fenton and Cox are expected to pick up the slack. Fenton recorded a personal best 18:37 last season and continued to perform well throughout the track and field season. Fenton also set school records in the 800 meters and earned All CAA honors in the 1500. Cox ran a season best 25:12 in cross country last year and went on to qualify for the ICAA Indoor Championship in the 3000 meters and to capture the CAA title in the 5000.

"We'll be counting on some of our upperclassmen like Heather and Tim to step up for us," says Sprecher. "We also have a talented group of newcomers entering our program who will make contributions during the season."

In addition to Fenton, the Lady Seahawks return Tricia Callison, Deidre Heyde, and Tracy Webb. Newcomers LaShundra Carter, Sonya Pitts, Shannon Williamson, and Winifred Winston make up the rest of the team.

The Men Seahawks return Danny Cash, Frank Ingrassi, Doug Liming, and Jeff Tiegs who all made major contributions to last year's team. New runners to the program are Thomas Coughlin, Flint Helms, Brad Sullivan, and junior college transfer Nick Thibodeaux who will solidify the team. Veteran runners Mike Rhodes and Vince Hovis should also contribute to the program.

The Seahawks, who placed fifth for the men and fourth for the women in last year's CAA Championships, kick off the season at East Carolina on Sept. 4.

The UNCW soccer team is beginning the season on September 4. The team is composed of 18 players, of which, six are goalies. Ken Lentz will be the starting goalie. Coach Cammidge, who felt he needed more time this year to evaluate the returning players, has an optimistic outlook for the team. Cammidge has spent the pre-season getting things into place with the team that are important to him, which may not have been there before. He stated, "I'm encouraged, but it is difficult to predict what the team will do."

Two open tryouts were held, which, according to Coach Cammidge, had no major turn-outs in attendance. The big disappointment in the pre-season was the absence of a few veteran players, leaving the team small and a little wet behind the ears. The coach said he is pleased with the new players and he, "likes their work ethic, approach and their attitude."

The team lost a scrimmage against Campbell 3-1 on Saturday Aug. 28th. This was the last exhibition game before the Sept. 4th game. The soccer team played exceptionally well against the two time South Conference Champions.

Considering the time, talent and set of circumstances, the team's goal is to make this a winning season. The UNCW soccer team has not had a winning season in four years. This year's team is confident that it will be a successful season. Cammidge stated, "I'm ready for the challenge, and it's going to be a challenge!"

Ultimate Team Wins Championship

The winds of Wilmington's winter and spring proved to be the ideal practice conditions for UNCW's men's ultimate frisbee team, as strong Pennsylvania mountain top gusts set the stage for the 1993 College Ultimate National Championships. In their 4th consecutive Final Four appearance, the Seamen defeated Black Tide of U.C. Santa Barbara 21-18 for the national title.

While winds gusted to over 20 mph the first two days of action the Seamen defense stood tall as opponents floundered to advance the disc up the field. Second year player Matt Mann, Jeff Johnson, and Bucky Corbin stood out on defense, while Mike Gerics and Troy Buggles' throws and Nick Myers and Brian Linkfield's catches paced the offense as Wilmington crushed both Wesleyan of Ohio and Madison, Wisconsin Friday, May 28th. UNCW trailed Madison 3-1 early, but lead 10-6 at half and allowed just one 2nd half goal to win 19-7.

Saturday, the break breezes increased but the Seamen zone stood firm, forced turnovers and scored quickly against the outmanned Kansas Jayhawks. Game four was a preview of the finals as the Seamen faced and defeated U.C. Santa Barbara (14-10). UNCW suffered its only defeat at the hands of an inspired yet soon to be eliminated University of Texas.

The semis were set for Sanday morning. Santa Barbara squared off against Santa Cruz and the Seamen were set against the Carleton team (C.U.T.). Wilmington set the pace early with powerful defense as C.U.T. was quickly disposed of 19-10 by the powerfully focused Seamen.

The Seamen faced Santa Cruz in the finals. Lead by an experienced core and memories of two finals losses (to Santa Barbara, 1990, Arizona and to Santa Cruz, 1991, Wisconsin). The Seamen were confident and poised despite eight goal-line turnovers during the 1st half. UNCW trailed by only 3 at the half 8-11. The Seamen started the second half fired up to set the pace. Wilmington took the first 3 points of the half and at 11-11 the tie seemed to be turning. UNCW rookies Scott Lefteris and Joe Warren rose to the occasion defensively and inspired the veterans to step up the offense.

The score flip-flopped to 13-13, then S.B. went up 15-13 before UNCW scored 4 straight to break the tie's back. UNCW went on to take their first championship 21-18. The victory established the Seamen as the most dominant college team in the nation, compiling a 33-5 record and becoming the 1st college team to earn a bid to the World Ultimate Club Championships in Madison, Wisconsin.

45 men's and 30 women's teams from all over the world competed and the Seamen had the opportunity to play the men's national champions from England, Switzerland, Canada and Germany as well as the #3 team in the world, Boston's Big Brother. UNCW finished the tournament as the 18th best team in the world.

Well it's another week and that means another episode of the Dumpster. Before I go any farther with this I would like to remind everybody who gave me grief about my college picks in the last issue that ESPN endorsed my picks by also ranking Nebraska number one. It's good to know that I'm not the only one with a little common sense in the sports world.

With that I will move into my NFL pre-season picks and once again these can be relied upon as if they were law. I'm not one to blow again these can be relied upon as if they were law. I'm not one to blow my own horn - that's a little disgusting - but I can tell you that this is my year. I'm in the zone and I've got this feeling that this could be the year that I pick all of the teams right and get invited to join the ESPN sports analysts with a multi-year, multi-million dollar contract. If not, at least I'll get to try it again next year.

Now, with no further delay, I am proud to introduce - "Erik Totten's NFL licensed and approved (OK that's a lie) pre-season National Football League picks". All that I will bother to mention are the teams that will win their division along with the teams that will lose their division. Who cares about the rest.

NFC EAST

Winning Team - No surprise here. Even without Emmet the Cowboys are a powerful team. Their receiving team of Harper and Irvin will pick up a little of the slack in the absence of Emmet. As long as Aikman stays healthy the Cowboys should still be good enough to win the NFC East but without the powerful running game that insured their success last season they won't make another Super Bowl appearance. Record, 13-3.

Losing Team - The Phoenix Cardinals - the Cardinals will be a little better this year but probably not good enough to make it above .500. After another one of those seasons I wouldn't be surprised to see coach Joe Bugel standing in the unemployed line in downtown Phoenix.

They did have a good off season by picking up Beuerline and drafting Hearst. They should show constant improvement after this season. Record, 5-11.

NFC CENTRAL

Winning Team - With the off season acquisitions, Green Bay is looking tougher than they have in a very long time. Reggie White is going to be a dominating presence on all fronts of the defense except maybe the defensive backfield. Mark Clayton and Jackie Harris are going to relieve a lot of pressure off Sterling Sharpe for Brett Favre. With easily the highest payroll in the NFL the pack is on the up and easily the highest payroll in the NFL the pack is on the up and coming in a sub par division. Record, 11-5.

Losing Team - Even though Tampa Bay is in the worst division in the league they still will lose at least ten games for the 11th consecutive season. They finally got rid of Vinny, but it didn't do much good. They still suck. Record, 3-13.

NFC WEST

Winning Team - Their defense is getting old and the offense needs more imagination but they still look good to me. Dunbar should have another great rushing season and they look to have a decent passing game with Helbert at the helm. They could have a hard time winning the division if Young has another good year for the 49ers. Record, 10-6.

Losing Team - The Rams should be a little better than last season but with an offensive line that couldn't stop my grandmother from pass rushing, Jim Everett will never have time to throw the ball. Record, 5-11.

AFC EAST

Winning Team - The Dolphins are looking as good as they have in the past couple of years and with Fryar, Ingram, and McDuffie filling up the receiver corps it looks like Marino will have some pretty good targets and who can resist Jackson at tight end. The Bills have more talent than the Dolphins but after another Super Bowl loss I don't think the Bills even want to make it again. Record, 11-5.

Losing Team - Even with Parcells trying to turn them around the Patriots still like the big one. Everybody is going to be traded but don't look for a winning record anytime soon. Record, 4-12.

AFC CENTRAL

Winning Team - Even though they lost a lot of defense the Steelers are still going to rise to the top in the AFC. Neil O'Donnell and Barry Foster should be very successful in leading the offense again, despite the lack of any decent receivers. They key to it all is Foster. If he has another good season so do the Steelers. Record, 12-4.

Losing Team - What's wrong with the Bengals. Unless they start paying some moolah to keep some of their established players and to acquire some new ones their are going to be in for a world of hurt for a long time. Record, 3-13.

AFC WEST

Winning Team - It's surprising what Joe Montana and a healthy elbow can do for a team. Marcus Allen will also add the all-purpose back that the Chiefs have needed for so many years. Even though they have a formidable defense the Chiefs will depend on Montana to lead the way and if he can stay healthy the Chiefs will be tough to stop. Record, 11-5.

Losing Team - The pre-season doesn't mean jack and Seattle will prove that this year. They had a pretty fair pre-season but lets face it - they suck.

There are the winners of the divisions but I'm sure all of you are anxious to hear, from the great predictor (just call me Nostradamus), who is going to be in the Super Bowl. Well here it is, pick up your phone so you can call all your friends. This year we will see Green Bay from the NFC and Pittsburgh from the AFC. I'm going to save the winner for later but this should be enough to keep all you football fans happy for a couple of months. Until then - keep your head out of the Dumpster and I'll see you back here, same time, same place.

Last week, The Seahawk reported that students living with temporary roommates would receive a $200 credit on his or her housing account. That statement should have read "any student who has a temporary roommate after Fall Break will receive a $200 credit on his or her housing account."

Last week, it was also reported that the National Student Exchange is done through Student Development. It is done through the Student Activities Office.

Convocation Brings Vision And Rewards

BY JIM CLARK
 Editor in Chief

UNCW officially kicked off the 1993-94 academic year with Convocation on Wednesday morning. The ceremony was used to address the desires of the administration for the institution's future and to recognize faculty for their excellence in teaching.

Chancellor James Leutze addressed the assembly with his goals for the university. "I can see UNCW during the next decade, energetically devoting itself to these five topics: undergraduate teaching, marine sciences, international affairs, public outreach, and environmental concerns."

Chancellor Leutze stressed afterward that though he addressed marine sciences in his speech as one of the five areas of devotion, he is as concerned with the advancement of the other academic fields as well.

"Marine sciences is the best vehicle for recognition," he said about getting UNCW known nationally. "We're one of the best in the country."

The Chancellor also announced the formation of a series of annual speeches to be held on campus: the Schweitzer Addresses. The first speech will be given by former Costa Rican President Oscar Arias, winner of the 1987 Nobel Peace Prize. That speech will take place October 4, 1993.

The speeches will be given once a year, alternating between Humanities, Medicine, and Music. The speeches will lead to the Schweitzer Award presentations to be given again in 1996.

Chancellor Leutze announced steps to increasing the academic environment of UNCW. Though the university currently is one of the strongest in the UNC system, the administration wants "to improve various measures of academic potential for entering students."

UNCW's current average SAT score is 935, but the administration would like that score raised to 1000 by the Fall of 1996.

The boost in average SAT scores should improve the school's first year retention rate, bringing it up to the UNC system average. Currently, UNCW's retention rate is 77% while the UNC system's average rate is over 83%.

The Chancellor also stated the university has set a four-year graduation rate expectancy of 30% by 1997. Presently, UNCW has a 24.6% rate.

He hopes to do this by increasing the number and variety of classes available in the night-time and summer schedules.

After the Chancellor's Address, recipients of the 1993 Faculty Award for Scholarship, the 1993 Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award, the 1993 Chancellor's Teaching Excellence Award, and the Distinguished Teaching Professorships were announced.

Dr. Robert Toplin, professor of history received the UNCW Faculty Award for Scholarship.

"It's a wonderful feeling," Dr. Toplin said after the ceremony. "So many members of the department are active in scholarship within the History Department, it makes us stay on our toes."

Dr. Toplin added that the department has published 25-30 books, including eleven in the last five years. There are currently five books in the process of being published right now.

Dr. Toplin, an accomplished scholar in American and Latin American history with an emphasis and interest in slavery, violence, and race relations, has also become a leading scholar in the field exploring history and the cinema. He has served as project director for numerous PBS television productions, served on various university committees, and been elected to local public school PTA's and the New Hanover Board of Education.

Through his numerous articles, books and presentations, Dr. Toplin has earned, as one colleague wrote, "...a national reputation as an especially perceptive and lucid historian."

Dr. Toplin received $1,500 for the faculty scholarship.

Dr. Fara Elilikai received the 1993 Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award.

The recipients of the 1993 Chancellor's Teaching Excellence Award were Dr. Larry Cable, History; Dr. Elitok, Mr. Philip Gerard, English; Dr. Richard Huber, Curricular Studies; and Dr. Youssy Sayed, Chemistry.

The recipients of the Distinguished Teaching professorships were Dr. John Garis, associate professor of production and decision science in the Cameron School of Business Administration; Dr. Diane Levy, professor of sociology; and Dr. William Overman, professor of psychology. Each distinguished professor recipient received a $5,000 per year stipend for three years.

What's next? Hold Our Hands When We Cross The Street?

Recently, there was some noise made about an article that ran on the Entertainment page. In the August 19 issue, staff writer Matt Jorgenson wrote on his experiences in Barbados as part of a summer Study Abroad.

He wrote that he had the time of his life and was a little sarcastic about the amount of school work demanded. Name one student who wouldn't be happy to have a class that takes him to a foreign country and has no exams or lectures, and only requires maintaining a journal? (Hell, most English majors would balk at maintaining a journal.)

Well, some people in this town wouldn't know sarcasm if it bit them on their Jesse Helms tattoo. They read the article as an invitation to go to Jamaica and experience the life down there. Live by their laws and customs, but with one major drawback, if you partake in the consumption of a narcotic legal in Jamaica, but not here, and you are caught, you will be sent home immediately.

Some that read the article that way suggested the professor, Dr. Thomas Lofffield, should be held responsible or accountable in some way to what the young adults who went with him, to learn from him, to experience an actual archaeological dig with him.

That is dead wrong.

The students who accompanied Dr. Lofffield to the Barbados are adults. As with the rest of the student body of UNCW, they are old enough and hopefully wise enough to make the correct decisions in their life. If they do not make the right decision, they will suffer the consequences. 'Nuff said.

For those individuals who overreacted to the article, would you like to hold a professor responsible for all the actions of 18 young adults for a month? If so, try to find a professor who will undertake the operation.

Imagine the professor who accompanies students to England's surprise when he hears two students jumped on the ferry and will be in Amsterdam in a couple of hours. Imagine a trip to Washington, D.C., and the terror that goes through the instructor's mind when a couple of students are arrested on drug charges.

Heck, if we are going to hold teachers responsible for the actions of their pupils overseas, why not implement the plan right here in good old Wilmington?

The Student Body President, Ziggy Nix, should bring onto the SGA floor an amendment that holds teachers responsible for the actions of all their students and advisees.

Soon, teachers will be sitting at all the bars of Wilmington (how many is that eight or nine?) checking on their students. They would also have to patrol all the off-campus living establishments for parties and under-age drinkers.

(If this movement gets big enough, the University of South Carolina will have to fire its football coach because the star quarterback was arrested for drinking a beer.)

Imagine the reaction Matt would have created if he had had premarital sex while in Barbados?

For shame, for shame.

It is time for people to realize not everyone is going to live their life the way one person would like them to. The Seahawk does not condone the behavior of Matt Jorgenson.

However, there is a line that has to be drawn somewhere (No, not that kind of line). If you do wrong and are caught, you pay the penalty. 'Nuff said.

However, because someone did something in the past and got away with it does not mean the whole society has to be turned upside down to prevent the behavior from occurring again.

If that were the case, Pat Robertson would have few followers. A report out during his ill-fated presidential campaign stated his first child was born seven months after he and his wife were married. Unless it was the Second Coming, I smell something fishy.

If the university comes up with a policy of mandatory drug-testing for all students who travel abroad, why not have one for all the students who receive financial aid who stay right here in the good ol' U.S. of A.?

Calm down folks. This is 1993. People do all sorts of things that are wrong. This incident, however, pales in comparison to the horrors going on in the rest of our country.

If Homosexuality Is Genetic, What's The Next Step?

WASHINGTON—If I were smarter, I'd avoid the subject, or at least leave it for private conjecture. But a columnist gets used to thinking in public, and what I've been thinking is this: Suppose it's proven beyond scientific doubt that homosexuality is genetically caused: What public or social policy should reasonably follow?

Surely it would make no sense to punish people for being what they unavoidably are, to deny ordinary rights to homosexuals because of their homosexuality would be as unfair—probably as unconstitutional—as denying rights to African Americans because they are black. Indeed, if sexual orientation turns out to be probably non-volitional, homosexuals might have as much claim as blacks or women or Native Americans to constitutionally protected special status. They clearly have been victims of discrimination, much of it official and based not on their individual qualities or behavior but on their membership in a discriminated-against group.

But, should homosexuality prove entirely non-volitional, not only would discrimination make no sense; neither would our fears that cultural change might convert non-homosexuals to homosexuality. One might as logically imagine persuading an impressionable short guy to become a six-footer.

Well, suppose science goes the other way. Suppose Simon LeVay's study, suggesting that one tiny part of the hypothalamus is smaller in homosexual men than in heterosexuals, turns out to have drawn false conclusions—that, for instance, the size differential is due to AIDS (all the gay men in the study died of AIDS) rather than sex itself. What does the absence of proof of a genetic source of homosexuality tell us about what our policy ought to be?

Nothing, as far as I can see. The overwhelming likelihood is that science can neither prove that our sexuality is totally predestined nor that it is wholly a matter of choice. The most anyone could reasonably expect by way of a breakthrough in this tricky field is a genetic predisposition one way or the other. And I have no idea what policy should reasonably flow from that.

I don't use the example just to drive homosexuals crazy (honest!), but suppose the same scientists who proved a genetic predisposition to homosexuality also proved a genetic predisposition to, say, violence. Should our policy toward violent lawbreakers be different depending on whether they have the violence gene or not? or do we punish violent behavior in everybody except those who literally cannot stop themselves from being violent?

Or suppose that medical science learns how to fix the errant gene, so as to reduce to "normal" the predisposition to violence. Should we offer the treatment to anyone whose genes impel them toward violence? Should we pay for it? Mandate it? And should our answer be different if the aberration is homosexuality rather than violence?

The point is not that homosexuality and criminality are comparable traits but to suggest that science is unlikely to be of much help (in either case) in our struggle for rationality and justice.

And despite the weight that many gays and lesbians give to the modest evidence of a genetic basis for homosexuality, I'm not sure they would want to follow the implications all the way. It's one thing to use science as absolutism ("I'm not a bad person; I simply am what God made me"); quite another to acknowledge abnormality ("There's something wrong with me.") Yet, if you accept that our sexuality is designed to perpetuate the genetic pool, its hard to see sexuality that cannot possibly have that result as other than abnormal.

Science may yet prove me wrong, but it seems fairly clear to me that homosexuality and heterosexuality exist not as absolutes but as points on a continuum. Few people strike me as either perfectly straight or perfectly gay. If what I accept as a commonsense observation is true, it follows that sexuality involves at least some volition—more, no doubt, for some than for others.

The question for me is not so much whether to penalize people for their sexual orientation as whether to nudge those who have a choice toward heterosexuality.

I know there are those, mostly homosexuals, as far as I can tell, who insist that choice has nothing to do with it: that their sexuality is, immutably, what it is. Why— they demand in support of that contention—would anyone choose the disadvantages of a gay life?

But then why would anyone choose the disadvantages of cross-dressing, bungee jumping, needle-sharing or appearing on Gerardo?

I don't know, but I doubt that the answer can be found in one tiny portion of the hypothalamus.

Pseudo-Scholars Attempt to Rewrite History

NEWPORT BEACH, Calif.—Amidst the genteel tinkle of restaurant lunch sounds, Mark Weber is having difficulty doing justice to his salmon, as is his passion for justice, as he pretends to understand it. He is trying to persuade me that the Holocaust never happened. It is not going well.

I am a hard sell, having visited death camps (Auschwitz-Birkenau, Majdanek, Treblinka) with survivors. But the fact that some Jews survived is part of the Holocaust deniers' "proof" that the Nazis never intended extermination.

Weber edits The Journal of Historical Review, a recent issue of which advertises a book "that dares to ask: Who Benefited from the 'Crystal'?" The Nov. 6, 1938, anti-Jewish rioting. If you guessed that the Jews benefited, you have got to the drift of Holocaust "revisionism."

"Revisionism" is a term of scholarship hijacking by pseudo-scholarship in the service of anti-Semitism. Holocaust deniers present any conflict among, or amendment of, survivors' testimonies, or any historical refinements of previous understandings, as "proof" that the Holocaust is a myth. Weber allows as how maybe a million Jews were victims—of the rigors of confinement, and of excessive Nazi security concerns. But Holocaust deniers say victims exaggerate, and after the war Nazis made false confessions to appease their captors, who were serving the myth-makers—Jews fabricating martyrdom for political and financial gains.

The deniers' "arguments" always return to what Weber, like the Nazis, calls "the Jewish question" (Judenfrage). The gas chambers were really showers. Zyklon-B gas was too weak to kill. Or too powerful to use for mass murder—it would have killed those who emptied the "alleged" gas chambers. When Hitler promised "the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe" (Jan. 30, 1939) he was, says one denier, merely using heroic hyperbole—"the kind of defiance that was hurled by ancient heroes." And so on.

For some people, historical partisanship, such as defending Richard III against the charge that he ordered the murder of the princes in the Tower, is a hobby. But what kind of person makes a career of denying the reality of an almost contemporary event that was recorded graphically, documented bureaucratically and described in detail by victims, bystanders and perpetrators? Such a person tortures the past in the hope of making the future safe for torturers.

In her new book "Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory," Deborah Lipstadt of Emory University argues that the deniers' work "is intimately connected to a neo-fascist political agenda." She says the deniers aim to rehabilitate Nazism and re-evaluate its victims, thereby delegitimizing Israel and vilifying Jews.

Hitler, says Weber at lunch, was "the most philosophical" figure of the 20th century, and "his understanding of this century was more on the mark than that of any of his contemporaries." And "Hitler has the 'rep' he has because he opposed the whole development of the 20th century." Anti-Semitic and anti-democratic, Hitler understood the necessity for severely hierarchical and racially homogenous nations.

Applying these ideas, Weber says that America "has two ways to go." It can become a "Third World" chaos of tribes, or it can be sundered into racially pure entities.

The Webers of the world are few and their "arguments" are farragoes of dizzying non sequiturs and mock-scientific analyses of a sort concocted only by lunatics or sinister cynics. But the deniers' increasing echoes, and their ability to insert themselves into the conversation of society, are cultural symptoms.

Holocaust deniers play upon contemporary society's tendency toward historical amnesia, and its muzzy notion of "tolerance" that cannot distinguish between open mind and an empty mind. Thus a young reporter for a respected magazine interviewing Lipstadt (without reading her book) asked this question: "What proof do you include in your book that the Holocaust happened?" That reporter passed through college unmarked by information about even the largest events of the century, but acquired the conventional skepticism of the empty-headed: When in doubt, doubt.

People as ignorant as that reporter know nothing, so they doubt everything except how sophisticated they are when they assume that nothing is certain. This assumption is irrigated in the badly educated by fashionable academic theories of epistemological indeterminacy. The vocabulary and mentality of literary "deconstruction" seeps everywhere, relativizing everything, teaching that history, like all of life, is a mere "narrative," a "text" with no meaning beyond what any individual reads into it. No event, no book, nothing has a fixed content; the individual's "perspective" or "reaction" to it is everything.

That's the bad news. The good news is that this year two million people will pass through Washington's new Holocaust Memorial Museum, which will survive the survivors and be their testimony.

Being Controlled By The Uncontrollable

Wasn't it interesting—watching ourselves—and everyone in the surrounding area waiting for Emily. Do we board our houses or not, move our boats or not, close down the campus or not?

As the winds increased so did our level of anxiety. Andrew's memory is burned too deeply in collective conscious not to feel anxious as wind speeds approached a hundred miles an hour. Now, in the aftermath of Emily's glancing visit to the Carolina coast I am aware of how much control she exercised over my life these last few days.

Control is an important issue in our lives. All of us like things to go our way. When something or someone else has power over us, we are uncomfortable. And when some real or possible disaster encroaches on our life, we are touched by fear. Why? Because our security is threatened, whether it be the security of our homes and all the things that we have made important to us or the security of a relationship on which we have come dependant or the security of our self confidence when it might be challenged.

Emily has provided us another opportunity to realize that we are never totally in control in this world and that despite our very best efforts, there is nothing that we can do to be free from some form of external threat to our well-being. Houses, boats, good health and nutrition, a good job; none of these assures us of the kind of control that will prevent the onslaught of some massive threat like Emily or Midwest floods or drunken drivers or corporate restructuring or cancer or one partner breaking trust in an important relationship. We simply are not in control and all our efforts at obtaining security and happiness do nothing more than create an illusion that makes the storms of life more deeply tragic than they may be in their own right.

There is a parable that talks about a person building a house with a solid foundation, but built on sand. A storm came, the winds blew and the house was destroyed. Another person built a house on a rock and the storms came and the house stood solid. A significant life issue is finding the rock that provides true security. The security of which I speak is not the security of protection from life's storms, but the security of knowing I am a survivor, that being grounded on the rock frees me to live with joy in a life filled with insecurity.

My Rock is the love of God. When I think about the worst things that could happen to me such as the loss of loved ones or serious loss of health, it is only when I reach down and touch that Rock deep inside of me that I have any sense that I could survive, that I could endure. I have both known personally and seen in the lives of countless other people the power to sustain derived from such confidence and trust in the love of God. I do not know if you have touched into your Rock. I do not know what name you give that Rock if you have discovered its strength and reality.

I do believe that Emily provides a rich opportunity to ask some significant questions of ourselves in terms of where our security does lie. To stand on the beach and to watch the waves crash upon the shore is to take in a new perspective on our mortality and vulnerability. To stand on a Rock discovered deep in the core of our own personal being is to be empowered to live with joy and fullness in a world where we know that one day some Emily is going to come ashore and its eye is going to pass over our house.

On Campus Dining: The Wagoner Hall Experience things that may or may not be celery or green peppers. This slab of "meal" is topped off with a peculiar orange sauce and tiny, leafy sprinkles that will undoubtedly get stoners talking. One bite of this stuff greatly decreases my appetite, but I have to eat or I'll go hungry. The mashed "potatoes" aren't bad, if you bath them in oil and gravy.

The roll is pretty good, but not worth the trouble it takes to get the drawer open they keep them in. The salad is somewhat edible, but let me take for a moment about the carrots.

Ideally, carrots are orange, crunchy, and great for your improving eyesight. Well, I believe I'd rather go blind than eat these discolored Wagoner Hall carrots, and I'm Where can you go to fill up your stomach if a) you live on campus, b) have zero cash, and c) have already spent all your declining balance on Chick-Fil-A? Your most likely choice will be to take a leisurely stroll over to Wagoner Hall, UNCW's massive and still relatively new dining hall. Having no other way to quiet my growling stomach, this is where I decided to go today.

Once entering Wagoner Hall, I stand in line for about ten minutes until the friendly meal card-checkers get the "O.K. Call" from upper management to let us in. As I make my way towards where the food is, I find myself admiring my surroundings. The inside of the dining hall is immense, clean, and attractive. There are tables to accommodate groups of any size, as well as a cluster of phony trees basking in the sun beneath a shiny glass ceiling.

Wow! But now it's time to eat! There are four basic lines to choose from: a deli, a line serving hamburgers, hot dogs, and grilled cheese sandwiches, a line called "Cafe" Features, and another entitled "Changing Scenes."

Since "Changing Scenes" is closed (why?) on this particular day, I decided to try something from "Cafe" Features.

I hear a group of guys joking about how "Changing Scenes" never really changes and I begin to wonder if they're being serious or not.

I hear a group of guys joking about how "Changing Scenes" never really changes and I begin to wonder if they're being serious or not.

My choices from the "Cafe" Features line include meatloaf, fried fish, quiche Lorraine, or last but not least, grilled cheese sandwiches. (They really like to peddle those things off, don't they?)

I decide to try the meatloaf, along with mashed potatoes, carrots, tossed salad, a banana, a roll, and a glass of milk. A tasty, well-balanced, healthy meal, right? Guess again.

The "meatloaf" is a grisly, gray and orange hunk of God-knows-what, stuffed with onions and little green someketchup. Also, I want to know when mayonnaise came to be considered "healthy." Oh well.

As I eat my "cheeseburger," which is actually somewhat edible, I notice one of my friends has a slice of red and white pie. When I ask him what it is, he laughs and says, "I don't know. I just like the colors, man."

Another friend tells me of the Enchilada Casserole, a story that has become a Wagoner Hall legend, concerning a bizarre experience he had two years earlier while dining there.

According to his story, he is a slave of enchilada casserole, which, by the time he'd made it back to his suite, had made him feel rather "high." He described this strange euphoria as something one would expect from a mix of speed and hallucinogens. His symptoms included hallucination, hyperactivity, laughing, and general delirium.

He went back to Wagoner Hall for the next three nights and ate more of the enchilada casserole to see if he could catch the same buzz. Fortunately, or unfortunately, (depending on how you look at things), it never happened again.

The bottom line is, you never know exactly what to expect from your dining experience in Wagoner Hall. So bring your patience and some good walking shoes and remember that anything is possible. Also, I'll advise you now not to bring in your Eastpaks or try to escape back and forth from my extra silverware or bananas. You might just get caught. And be forewarned: there is a strong possibility that "Wagoner's Revenge" will hit you as soon as you're done eating. What exactly is Wagoner's Revenge? Well, I won't spoil the fun, so I'll let you all find out for yourselves. Enjoy!

Watch For The Substitutes

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

As I mentioned in an earlier article this year, live music is my life. And, last week my life went through a kind of religious revival when I went to The Mad Monk to see a band called The Substitutes.

These guys (and gal) showed me that originality is possible in the late 20th century. Nevertheless, I was blown away by everything they did. First and foremost was their style. They draw from everything today's music has to offer and synthesize it with the precision of a brain surgeon.

They pulled aspects from grunge to classic rock and roll as well as everything in between. The next thing that impressed me was the originality at the end of one song when they broke into "Brass Monkey" for about 20 seconds and aside from that, they played like their songs were good, not some cheesy repetitious monotonous song. The show itself was also awesome. The four members on stage were tight.

Tempo changes were done with excellence and all the members put 110% into the show. They actually moved around on stage and just didn't stand there looking bored. And when the band gets active upon the stage, it makes for a much better show. Another thing that impressed the hell out of me was the ability and quality of each member's performance.

Here I'd like to take a look at one of the most unseen pieces of a band. The drummer for The Substitutes was one of the best I've seen in quite sometime. If you think about it, music just wouldn't be music without some percussion, yet drummers get little credit.

Despite this, I was simply awestruck by Jeremy's percussion. It brought in so much to the music that I could hardly stand it.

Bass was just phenomenal, too. Jason did everything on his bass from slow dirges to slapping, spanking pumped up funk. The power of the 20th century. Nevertheless, I was blown away by everything they did. High ends, low ends, solos and everything else possible was played on only one guitar. If the bass and drums provided the power, then Josh's guitar playing could only be seen as the drive train of the band.

To round out the show, Brandi provided the raw energy to fuel everything. She sang like there was no tomorrow. She did everything from slow sexy melodies, to belting out full on screams. The tightness of the four made for a show that sent chills down my spine on a few occasions and left me leaving the place completely revitalized on the live music scene.

If you like music, go see The Substitutes. They will be playing on the 12th here at school (from what I understand) and also in the future at clubs and parties around Wilmington. Go to Poindexter Records and ask for the CD. It should be out shortly. Until next week, Gute Nacht and watch for The Substitutes. You won't be disappointed.

Review of Blind Melon

Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

Blind Melon, a groovy little alternative band from California, is the latest group to be blessed with MTV and Top 40 overkill with the single "No Rain." Undoubtedly, you've all seen it plenty of times.

When you pop the Blind Melon CD in your stereo, you might as well skip the first song, entitled "Soak the Sun." This particular song is a throw away track that rambles all over the place like a sloppy Guns-N-Roses tune, only it's not as loud.

But, "Tones of Home," the next song, is an instantly likable and funky tune reminiscent of James Addict's "Standing in the Shower...thinking." "Tones of Home" is a great one to crank at parties while "I wonder" slows things down a bit to showcase Shannon Hoon's vocals. This is a pretty good song - especially the slower, more mellow parts.

"Paper Scratches" has a groovy intro, but sounds a lot like "Tones of Home" with a cheesy Boston-esque chorus. "Dear 'ol Dad" and "Change" are catchy and melodic, but sort of generic. Then comes "No Rain," the band's instant claim to fame, which is a pretty cool sing-along, except for the fact that I'm getting very, very sick of it. (MTV, PLEASE QUIT IT!)

"Deserted" is more of the same rambling and sloppy funk with a catchy chorus. "Sleepyhouse" is a sleepy track indeed, and my favorite song on the CD. It features a majestic chorus where Hoon cries out,

"I'm feeling better when I'm high." This song stays in my head longer than any of the others, with the exception of "No Rain," which of course is in my head because it has been beaten into my brain by MTV.

"Holy Man" comes on and I decide that I'm getting a little bored. This is getting a little repetitious. This is getting a little repetitious. "Seed to a Tree" is another throw away, while "Drive" uses a percussion sweep similar to that in the Dead's "Uncle John's Band." Unfortunately, if this was Uncle John's Band playing this song, the Dead would have never written about them. Hoon's vocals, that at one time sounded cool and different, are beginning to get on my nerves.

Fortunately, the CD ends on a good note, with a song called "Time," but by this time, it's too little too late.

Although "Tones of Home" and "Sleepy House" are both excellent tunes, there's little to recommend on the album as a whole.

Blind Melon has a somewhat unique and groovy sound, but the problem is that it all sounds the same.

Next time, spend less time rambling and a little more time writing songs, guys.

Overall rating: C+ ("Tones of Home" is a good song to have)

New Colors, New Uniforms

BY KATIE ALLEN
Sports Writer

If you are a typical incoming freshman or transfer student, you may be asking yourself, "What exactly are UNCW's school colors?" This is a thought that has passed through the minds of many new, and also, returning, students.

The University has recently abandoned its traditional colors of Kelly green and yellow and adopted a more modern combination of teal green and navy blue. Jennifer Ally, assistant athletic director, stated, "The new colors convey a more coastal theme."

This change has made it necessary to revamp the uniforms in the athletic department. The women's basketball program will be receiving their new uniforms from Champion Sportswear. The program had been associated with Champion in the past, but in recent years the company did not carry the appropriate colors to match the team. The women's team will purchase the home set of uniforms and will receive the additional set at a reduced fee.

While the majority of the athletic teams will not be sporting new and trendy uniforms, the men's soccer team and basketball team are some of the few that will be able to strut the new colors. Hopefully, within the next year, the athletic department will have converted their entire stock of uniforms. This will be a costly and time consuming process, but it will be well worth the end result to see our athletes adorned in the appropriate Seahawk colors.

BY ERIK TOTTON
Sports Editor

Well, the first week of the football season is over, and once again I was reminded of why I enjoy the football season so much. As I was chillin' in my recliner, with a cold one at my side, watching every game that was televised (and watching the Braves game during commercials) it became clear. When else can you do nothing else all day except watch TV and not be ashamed to tell anybody about it (Well I'm never ashamed but I know it bothers some people). It's even better when your a Sports Editor, then when people tell me to get up and do something I can patiently reply that I am working and doing research on a very important article for the paper.

I have one thing to remark on from the first week of the football season: Joe Montana is a football God. Almost two years in between start and he leads his team to win while passing for over 250 yards. Joe has got it going on.

As far as college football goes, my boys from Nebraska won 76-14 while at the same time getting 360 yards rushing WITHOUT Calvin Jones. I'm telling you, this is their year. I'll admit I didn't have a very good week as far as my predictions but I think, no wait, I know this week will be better. Last week I was distracted and wasn't really concentrating on my picks. This week I can tell it though I'm in the zone. This is my week.

In baseball I think the Braves deserve to be at least mentioned in the Dumpster. I've never really liked the Braves but I've got to admit it, they're something else. They took five out of six from the Giants and they're looking just as good now. I think we'll all be doing the Tomahawk chop in October.

The Seahawk Soccer time is also looking pretty good. They beat the Citadel 3-1, with two goals from Bucky Corban. Congrats guys-keep it up.

That's it for now, keep you head out of the Dumpster and I'll see you back here same time, same place.

The UNCW Seahawks traveled to Greenville, NC this weekend to compete with host East Carolina and Coastal Carolina in the Hukam Karam relay meet. The Seahawks were provided with a unique training session for their first meet of the season. The format consisted of teams of two competitors, running one mile before tagging their partners. Each participant ran three one-mile legs to complete the six-mile requirement.

The Seahawks' men turned in the top three finishes for the meet, with Danny Cash and Tim Cox capturing first place (28:59), Jeff Tiegs and Doug Lining taking second (29:44), and Frank Ingrassi and Nick Thibodeaux finishing third (30:26).

For the UNCW women the team of Heather Fenton and Tracy Webb (37:08) finished first for the Seahawks and third overall behind ECU's top two finishers.

The Seahawks return to action this Saturday to defend their title and to host the 9th Annual Seahawk Invitational at Brooks field. Also at the meet will be Virginia Tech, Duke, South Carolina, Old Dominion, Richmond, Campbell, UNC Greensboro, The Citadel, North Carolina A&T, and Shaw. "This is going to be one of the largest meets held in North Carolina this season," says second-year coach Jim Sprechen. "Both the college and high school fields will be very competitive."

The college men will run an 8K course while the college women and all high school performers will compete in a 5K course. "For many of the schools, this will be their first meet of the year," Sprechen says. "I'm sure a lot of the coaches will be using this as a gauge to see where their athletes stand after the summer." The action gets underway at 8:00 am.

On September 4th the UNCW soccer team began a winning season with a score of 3-1 over The Citadel in Charleston, SC. The two scoring players were: freshman, Matthew Cumminff with one goal and the Athlete of the Week, Bucky Corban with two goals. Ken Lentz played an outstanding game as goalie giving up only one goal to The Citadel's Tom Metherell. The Seahawks outshot the Bulldogs 17-4, of which Corban made 10 shots. The upcoming games against Chowan and the Eastern Carolina Invitational are this week on Sept. 8 and Sept. 11-12, respectively.

For the Lady Seahawks, headed by Coach Kathy McDaniel, the outlook for a winning season is promising. The team moved it's record to 1-2 over the weekend in the UNC's tournament at Chapel Hill, NC.

Senior Amy Chilausky led UNCW to a victory over UNC Asheville (10-15, 15-10, 15-19, 15-11). The team lost then to UNC Chapel Hill and UNC Charlotte.

The next game for the Lady Seahawks will be on Sept. 15 at Duies Creek, NC for a match against Campbell. The first home matches take place on Sept. 17-18 in the Comfort Inn Classic at Hanover Hall. Come out and support the Lady Seahawks!

Baker Gains Experience

BY KATIE ALLEN
Sports Editor

Ganon Baker, a 6'1" junior guard, who transferred from Duquesne University last year, remained active in the off-season and over the past summer.

Baker participated in a seven game basketball tour with the People's People Sp rts all-star team. The team, composed of eight players from Division I universities, competed against professional and national teams in Austria and Slovenia.

"It was an excellent experience playing over there," said Baker. "In addition to improving my basketball skills, I was able to see another part of the world, which makes you realize how many things we take for granted in this country."

Baker proved to be a tremendous asset to the team. He participated in all seven games and made his presence felt in each one. Baker averaged 12.7 points with a game high of 25 against Postojna. In his final three games he averaged 22 points.

as a Seahawk basketball player in the upcoming 1993-94 season. If his performance over the summer is only a preview of what is yet to come, the men's basketball program is guaranteed a beneficial addition to it's team.

Senior Athlete Profile

BY JOELLE KUBLER
Sports Writer

Paul Cairney, a 25 year old English-major graduate student originally from Clydebank, Scotland, is this year's senior captain on the UNCW Men's Soccer Team. Paul came to the U.S. in the Fall of 1989 to play soccer at UNCW. Although he was offered other scholarships, Paul chose to attend UNCW for its beautiful location and the size of the university.

Paul has been playing soccer since he was 4 years old and contributes much of his talent to his continued exposure to the game of soccer everyday of his life. Growing-up in Scotland, Paul mentioned it would be difficult not to become involved with soccer, since that is the most predominant sport and where the professional and national teams originated and are located. The major difference is playing soccer in the U.S. Paul states is the fact he can concentrate on his ball skills, instead of concentration on the entire game itself as it is done in Scotland. "The biggest thing is that I'm given the opportunity to touch a ball everyday and the opportunity to play and push myself," Paul comments, who he feels has made him a better player since he has left Scotland.

Paul is wholeheartedly a "team-oriented" player. His primary goal for his upcoming and final season as a soccer player is to have a winning season (which he has never experienced at UNCW) and to establish credibility for the soccer program. "I want to win," Making 2nd team all conference last season, Paul stated that he would like to make 1st team all conference this year, but he rather see the team get recognized as a whole than just himself.

Paul hopes to see the program itself take-off this season headed by the new coach, Keith

"Graham Taylor" Cammidge from England. "He has brought organization and discipline into the program, and the team is looking good, but it is up to us (the team) since soccer is a 'player's game' not a 'coach's game.'" Coach Cammidge is building a foundation in his developing year for the UNCW Men's Soccer Team, and although he couldn't recruit much, he is taking the program to great studies to complete with the strongest teams in the conference. Paul is very optimistic towards his team this season.

Although graduate school is taking up much of his time, Paul remains an excellent student and balances his time well between athletics and academics. "All you have to do is manage your time and study when you have to," Paul comments. He also has excellent parental support when it comes to academics and soccer. Paul believes his sense of humor and his ability not to take himself too seriously has contributed to his achievement in both areas. Among some of his honors are Chancellor's Cup, Alumni Achievement Award, Phi Kappa Phi National Honor Society, Who's Who in American Colleges and Universities, Academic All-American, and Dean's List.

After Paul's senior year, he would still like to stay involved with soccer. He hopes to coach soccer at the collegiate level in the future.

Paul's advice to anyone interested in playing soccer at the collegiate level is "to play against good players." Paul states you need to play at a higher level such as a club team or with older guys while you're still in high school to get the necessary preparation and competition you need to play at the collegiate level and become a good player.

Paleontologist Dr. Robert Bakker

Jurassic Park Comes To UNCW

BY LISA PRICE
 Staff Writer

Renowned paleontologist Robert T. Bakker will be speaking at UNCW on Friday, September 17 at the Senior Picnic. This speech will take place between twelve noon and 2 p.m. in the University Center Ballroom. This is the first year the senior picnic has been held. Invitations to the free picnic are placed in all senior's mailboxes. This event is sponsored by the UNCW Alumni Association.

Bakker, one of the most controversial paleontologists in North America, has acquired an international reputation for insisting that dinosaurs were not only quick, active creatures, but that they have direct living descendants among birds. He also believes that there were about eighty dinosaur ages instead of one.

To dinosaur fans, Bakker is somewhat of a celebrity. Many of his ideas about dinosaurs can be seen in the movie "Jurassic Park." He has been featured in several dinosaur documentaries including "The Great Dinosaur Hunt," "T. Rex Exposed," A&E's "Dinosaurs I" with Walter Cronkite, and most recently, "The Dinosaurs!" He is the author and illustrator of The Dinosaur Heresies.

Bakker says that his infatuation with dinosaurs hit in the fourth grade. He recalls an early fifties Life magazine issue with dinosaurs on the front cover, introducing a new article series. Bakker read the series of articles and has never been able to rid himself of the dinosaur infatuation.

Bakker, who graduated from Yale and Harvard is a vertebrate paleontologist and adjunct curator of paleontology at the University Museum, University of Colorado, Boulder. He is also a paleontological consultant for Dinamation International Corp. and is a board member of Dinamation International Society, a nonprofit organization committed to preservation, education, and researching dinosaur paleontology.

Bakker will give another lecture, "Hot and Cold Running Dinosaurs," Friday evening at 7:30 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. The lecture is free, but reserved seating is required and tickets must be picked up in advance at the Kenan box office.

SGA Fall Elections Are In

BY JIM CLARK
 Editor in Chief

The ballots have been counted and the results are in. The newest members of the UNCW Student Government Association are Nate Stansfield, Freshman Class President; Kristen Dougherty, Freshman Class Vice President; Freshman Class Senators Jenn Maxwell and Bruce Hunter. Fall Representatives-At-Large John Bean, Steven May, Roger Jackson, Russ C. Bryan, Sonja C. Rowe, Daniel Williams, and Dana Borris.

In an election that concerned mostly freshmen, they represented 59% of the voter turnout. Of the 8,157 total student body, only 631 students voted. Out of around 1,900 total freshmen, 435 voted.

Freshman President-elect Nate Stansfield received 36% of the freshmen vote (156 out of 430 votes).

Vice President-elect Kristen Dougherty received 186 of the 421 votes, 44%.

The percent of freshmen voting, 23%, was high according to SGA Election Board Chairman Alvin Phillips.

"The turnout (for all students) was about right," Phillips said after the votes had been tallied. Only 8% of the student body voted.

The overall turnout was hurt by the lack of students running for the Fall Representative-At-Large positions. There are seven positions and only seven people ran. Only 196 upperclassmen voted, representing 3%.

Exit Polls Indicated Freshman Favored Nate Stansfield For Freshman Class President

BY KRISTY SHUMAKER
 JULIE GRACE
 Staff Writers

"I voted for him because he must be a good guy if he was trash can monitor in the second grade," said one student who voted for Nate (N-8) Stansfield for Freshman Class President.

Another student who voted for Stansfield said, "I voted for him because I thought his N-8 concept was creative and he seems enthusiastic."

"I voted for Heather Mills because she has a nice name and she sounds cute," one freshman commented.

Exit polls indicated freshman favored Nate Stansfield and Heather Mills for Freshman Class President, largely because of their efforts in getting their names seen as much as possible.

For example, Nate Stansfield hung posters and distributed fliers in dormitory halls, classroom buildings and University Union. Heather Mills also distributed fliers in dormitories and wrote messages on sidewalks.

Students polled felt Jeff Dean, who is also running for Freshman Class President, was organized in his campaign. One student said, "He had cards and banners made and put forth an effort and this says something about how he would be in office."

"I voted for Heather League for Vice President because I've seen her posters around campus and they caught my eye," one freshman responded. Another who voted for Kristen "Doc" Dougherty said she was the only candidate he remembered from the campaign.

Students polled seemed to favor Bruce Hunter for Freshman Class Senator. One freshman said, "I voted for Bruce Hunter because I knew him from the beginning and he really wants to do this. He has a lot of ideas."

"I voted for Bruce Hunter because he sounds cute," said another freshman. One student said, "I voted for girls for all the other things, and I wanted to vote for a guy."

Many students ridiculed the lack of competition for Representatives-at-Large, with only seven candidates for seven seats. "I picked seven and there were only seven. The choice wasn't that hard," one person commented.

"I voted for myself because I think I'd make a good Rep-at-Large," said John Bean.

Dana Borris said, "I'm on the ballot and I voted for myself because I want to make an impact at UNCW. I'm a loud person and people hear me. They listen to what I have to say."

Many students complained about the SGA Election process. One freshman said, "I think it's bullshit that we're voting on name recognition only. We just got here and don't really know the people running, but I wish they could have at least had some debates." Another freshman said, "I'm not going to vote for someone just because he or she has a nice name."

An estimated sixty percent of respondents criticized the SGA election process. Many said they wish they could've learned more about candidates' responsibilities and prospective contributions to student government.

Students also said they felt there were no serious efforts taken to educate people about the candidates. One person said, "This election is not really significant because we don't get to hear from candidates, because it's only on a name recognition basis."

SGA had the largest turnout in its history this spring, with approximately 1000 students voting. Election Board Chair Alvin Phillips attributed the heavy turnout primarily to candidates who were very active in gaining publicity for their campaigns. For example, debates between candidates were held in Wagoner Dining Hall. Phillips said SGA mixed the debates in this election despite heavy turnout in the previous election.

SGA Office Manager Susie Goodrum said Wednesday that turnout had been good. Latest figures indicated that about 400 students had voted.

Dean Rosenkoetter Resigns

BY AMY BRENNAN
 New Editor

WILMINGTON, NC — Dr. Marlene M. Rosenkoetter, dean of the School of Nursing at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, today announced her resignation as dean effective July 1, 1994. It is customary in academic administration to give a year's notice to allow a national search.

Rosenkoetter came to UNC Wilmington in 1981 as chair of the then Department of Nursing. Her mission was to plan and implement a baccalaureate degree program in nursing at UNCW, phasing out the existing associate degree program. The UNCW School of Nursing opened in 1984, accepted its first students as juniors in 1985, and graduated the first class in 1987. Since then, 157 students and 42 Registered Nurses have received degrees. Currently enrolled are 127 students in the junior/senior major and several hundred more are enrolled in pre-requisite courses.

Accomplishments during her tenure are numerous, including gaining all the approvals necessary to establish and accredit the program. These included approval from the UNC Board of Governors to establish the program, approval from the North Carolina Board of Nursing, and accreditation by the National League for Nursing which was obtained in 1987 with the first graduation class.

Graduates of the program reflect its quality. Their nurse licensing exam scores are the highest of any bachelor of science nursing program in North Carolina, with an average pass rate of approximately 99 percent. Two UNCW nursing students were named North Carolina Student Nurse of the Year — Shell Crumb in 1990 and Lisa MacIntosh in 1993.

Under Rosenkoetter's direction, the nursing faculty has moved from a bachelor's prepared faculty to one prepared primarily at the doctoral level. Library holdings in nursing moved from about 50 current books to more than 10,000 and nearly 100 nursing journals. In 1989 she was elected as a Fellow of the American Academy of Nursing.

"I decided some time ago that this would be my last year as dean, and I have so notified UNCW officials," she said. "I am looking at several opportunities, but at the present time have made no decision. I now plan to focus on several exciting projects that we have underway. These include the Barbados international nursing project, completing a self-study in preparation for National League for Nursing reaccreditation in 1995, and a Native American celebration scheduled for April 8, 1994," Rosenkoetter said.

The Barbados project enabled UNCW nursing students to spend one summer session this year working in hospitals and clinics in developing nation. It is the only international nursing program in North Carolina and the only one approved by the NC Board of Nursing.

Reflecting on her decision to resign as dean, UNCW Provost Marvin K. Moss commented that Rosenkoetter's 13 years of leadership at UNCW have brought the School of Nursing to a level that is "recognized throughout the state and the Southeast as a program of excellence. She is to be commended for her work in taking a two-year program to the baccalaureate level, achieving high passing rates, and bringing UNCW distinction.

"Speaking for the university and particularly the School of Nursing, I appreciate her dedication in bringing about these significant accomplishments for UNCW," Moss said.

It is anticipated that a national search will take place to find a new dean. Details will be announced later.

Cameron Sperry Named To North Carolina Writers' Network

BY JIM CLARK
 Editor in Chief

Cameron Sperry, part-time lecturer in the English Department, was recently named the President of the Board of Trustees of the North Carolina Writer's Network, Inc. The Network, a non-profit organization, was established in 1985 and is currently 1,600 members strong.

Sperry was asked to be president because the Network wanted someone who could do the job and hadn't been with the organization long. She feels she can bring new ideas to the Network.

"My job is to lead the board in meetings, and to act as a representative of the Writers' Network in this area of the state and at the Network-sponsored functions we have, and in any kind of writing situation," Sperry said.

Sperry received her undergraduate and Master's degrees from UNCW. She is planning to go back to school this summer.

During her one-year reign, she hopes to establish very clear and comfortable communications among the board members and the members.

The Network was established to give writers opportunities to connect with other writers, develop and broaden audiences, and provide literary opportunities for writers and readers of culturally diverse backgrounds, among others.

"Network is the key word," she said with a smile. "Part of it has to do with the size of the state. There are a lot of rural areas and in the past has been a lot of organized activity in the Triangle area, the urban areas, and not so much in others."

The next major function for the Network is the Fall Conference to be held November 19-21 in Winston-Salem.

The three-day event will feature classes, discussions, book signings, and a chance to meet fellow writers from around the state. The conference is open to anyone who wants to attend. $95 for NCWN members and $110 for nonmembers.

Also underway is the Randall Jarrell Poetry Prize. This international contest honors Randall Jarrell's important literary contributions as a poet and teacher.

The Network, headquartered just outside Chapel Hill in White Cross School, offers an extensive collection of literary magazines, writing reference books and books by North Carolina authors. The Network also offers a critiquing service for members for a nominal fee.

Sperry said that writing is traditionally a solitary endeavor and that is a large part of writing, "but it's also good for writers to get together with other writers and people who understand what they do."

"Another goal of the Network is to bring writers and writing to a broader audience," Sperry said.

"You can't live as a writer in your room. You have to live your life because life is where the writing comes from."

If you are interested in attending the Fall Conference or would like more information about the North Carolina Writers' Network, go by Sperry's office in Kenan 209. The bulletin board next to her office also has information about the conference and Jarrell Poetry Prize.

WWII Lecture Series Continues

"The Most Successful Bureaucratic Looting Exercise"

BY STUART KASIN
Production Manager

Despite the atrocities and the unspeakable horrors committed against the Jews by the Nazis during World War II, Dr. Susan E. Cernyak-Spatz feels, "We need to re-tell our stories so that they can be passed down to younger generations, hopefully preventing tragedies like the Holocaust from happening again." Dr. Cernyak-Spatz, an Auschwitz survivor, spoke to an audience of over 500 at the second World War II lecture sponsored by the UNCW Museum of World Cultures.

Cernyak-Spatz began her struggle for survival in 1936 when she left Germany for Vienna. From Vienna she went to Prague. Hitler seemed to be behind her every step of the way. Her entire family, with the exception of her father, was caught and sent to a concentration camp. Over the next three years, the family was moved from camp to camp through "transport." Transport was the system the Nazis used to cart the Jews from camp to camp. It was made up of old box cars and an occasional passenger car. As many as 200 prisoners were put in one car.

Dr. Cernyak-Spatz said "The German Holocaust was the most successful bureaucratic looting exercise ever." Her statement refers to the huge number of lies told by the Germans in order to create a perfect image of Germany. Cernyak-Spatz told how "...the noise put out by the crying Jews on their way to the gas chamber could not be eliminated by the Christmas carols that the German army sang for her and her office colleagues." These office jobs were given to the Jews if they new of an official who would assign one to them. This job was their only time that Dr. Cernyak-Spatz could remember that she was allowed to sit.

Throughout the Holocaust the Nazi's fed their people propaganda and lies. They tried to cover up the human inclination by strategically placing the "death camps" in areas where the stench of the burning bodies would not float into Germany. They used the Red Cross as a sign of security to ease the minds of the Jews. Political figures were brought in to show the world that Germany was doing nothing wrong. On May 1, 1945, after Hitler's Death, Dr. Cernyak-Spatz and many others made their "walk for liberation."

Today, Cernyak-Spatz is a professor at UNC Charlotte in the Department of Foreign Languages.

The lecture was the second in a series. The first lecture was given by UNCW Chancellor James Leutze.

A World War II exhibit featuring the Kristallnacht print series by Erwin Eisch will begin on Oct. 4, in the University Center. The series commemorates the event that began the persecution of the Jews by the Nazis.

Tightening Dorm Security

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

Residence assistants have been swamped with complaints and questions about the new changes that took place in the residence halls over the summer. Returning students were shocked to discover that they no longer had all the freedom that they had last year.

In an effort to provide students with answers to their questions, Robbie Wise, a residence assistant of Graham Hall, called a meeting on Aug. 23 to give students a chance to discuss their concerns directly with the source, Bill McCartney, director of Housing and residence life. There were about 75 people present and ready to voice their opinions on the new changes that are now an inevitable part of their residence hall life. One change in particular that students seemed to be most concerned with are the desk receptionists. The primary functions of the desk receptionists are to provide service and security. They help monitor the flow of guests, provide residence information, check out recreation equipment.

Even though the purpose of the desk receptionist seems perfectly reasonable, many students do not like it. Sophomore Schwartz Hall resident, Felicia D. Strand feels it is unfair that "you have to show your I.D. all the time, even when they know you are there. It's an inconvenience for guests that reside off campus, as well as those that live on campus. My parents can't even come up to see me without being signed in." However, the desk receptionists of Schwartz Hall like the change. "It's easy to keep track of what's going on in the residence halls. Guests leave their I.D. Residents must show their I.D. and escort their guests at all times. 'I like it. I feel more secure,'" said desk receptionist, Selena Southerland.

Last year there were many problems with non-student visitors in the residence halls. McCartney said, "Students were unhappy with the change from total freedom to limited access. I know it's an inconvenience but a change in convenience is worth it to provide more safety to the halls. We have a concern that students learn, study, and play in a safe environment."

There are desk receptionists on duty for approximately 18 hours a day, seven days a week. Many students have mentioned that they feel like prisoners in their own homes. Furthermore, they are enraged at the fact that they did not even get to vote on the use of desk receptionists. McCartney explained that students do not vote on operational issues. They did get to vote on the extension of visitation hours, but not the sign-in part of the policy.

All side and back doors of the residence halls are now kept locked at all times. If anyone tries to exit through any of those doors, a loud piercing alarm will go off until a residence assistant or a desk receptionist turns it off.

UNCW Student Meets Bob Barker

BY ERICA BRANDON
Staff Writer

Sophomore, Robin Miller had the unique opportunity over the summer to experience the bright lights on one of America's best known television game shows.

Miller sent away for free tickets to the "Price is Right" before going to California to visit family. She went to Los Angeles during the second week of May to appear on the show, but it did not air until June 1.

Everyone who was to appear had to go through a long grueling day of waiting. Miller arrived at the studio at 7 a.m. and participated in the second filming which did not begin until 5 p.m. All of the potential contestants that were to appear in that filming had to be interviewed first. Before filming even starts, the producers of the show determine who will be called.

Once on the show, Miller guessed the exact price of a ceiling fan for which she received $100. She did not stop there. She played "price poker" and won a dog house, a dinette set, a Bombay chest, and silver plates during that game. Robin went on to spin the big wheel and spun 95 on the first spin. Here she was able to compete in the show case and here is where her luck ran out. She lost.

Even though Miller lost the show case, she really cherished the experience because she was so excited about meeting Bob Barker, the show's host. "I never miss a show," confessed Miller. "The only reason I went was to meet Bob Barker."

Burney Returns For Bookstore Re-opening

BY MELANIE HURLEY
Staff Writer

After undergoing seven months of renovations, the university bookstore held its grand re-opening ceremony Wednesday, Sept. 15.

Bookstore manager Arnold Siko was the first speaker at the ceremony. He said he was "extremely proud" of the new store, and he thanked the staff for a "job well done" and for enduring the months that the store was housed in two trailers.

Provost Marvin Moss wished the bookstore staff continued success. He introduced John and Betty Burney, for whom the Burney Student Support Center is named. The building was built in 1985 specifically for the bookstore. John Burney is an "avid supporter of UNCW," Moss said. He has served on the UNCW Board of Trustees, including a few years as chairman. As a state senator, he helped authorize Wilmington College to become a part of the UNC system. He was also responsible for securing the funds for the construction of Friday Hall, enabling UNCW to establish its marine biology studies. Betty Burney cut the ribbon at the end of the ceremony.

Refreshments were served and a drawing for doorprizes was held. The winners of the prizes are:

Steve Stuart won the bicycle, Judy McMullen and Dr. Maxwell won mini Sony televisions, Noel Gray and Nate Hill won $25 bookstore gift certificates.

Carolyn Cook won a giant teddy bear.

Sara White won a UNCW sweatshirt.

Michael Modlin won balloons, Mathew Mayo won a day planner.

Jennifer Smith and Kelly Vaitis won Itza Pizza certificates.

Non-traditional Newsletter Begins Next Week

BY FIONA RICE
Staff Writer

A non-traditional student newsletter will be published beginning this fall thanks to the efforts of a former UNCW non-traditional student.

The newsletter, called the Retread, will address the special needs and concerns of non-traditional students. The title is from military jargon and refers to someone who has left the military and then re-enlists.

By the university's definition, a non-traditional student is an undergraduate who is over the age of 23 and returned to school after an absence of three or more years.

Crystal Hoel originally submitted the idea for the newsletter in the Chancellor's suggestion box when she was an undergraduate last fall. Being the mother of four children and commuting from Jacksonville daily, Hoel had little chance to get to know the UNCW campus and its available services. She felt the newsletter could provide this information to non-traditional students.

Dr. Paul Johnston, director of the Student Development Center, approached Hoel last April about doing the newsletter herself. The Student Development Center provides the paper, printing, and postage. Office space and equipment as well as secretarial services are also provided as needed.

Hoel volunteers her time and writes the newsletter herself.

The first newsletter will contain information about campus services and how to access them. Also included will be an opinion page, classified ads (need a baby-sitter?), a comic, and a profile of a non-traditional student.

Non-traditional students will get their first newsletter within the next week. If the response is good, they will be distributed every 4-6 weeks.

A main concern of Crystal's in the newsletter will not reach all students who are non-traditional. Roughly 20% or 2,000 of UNCW's students, 18-65 years old, is non-traditional in some way. However, the newsletter is only mailed to those students who fit the university's definition.

Since many non-traditional students commute from outside of New Hanover county, the newsletter will be mailed to their homes. A December 1992 graduate with a degree in Middle School Education, Hoel now teaches at Brewster Middle School at Camp Lejeune.

If you do not receive a newsletter and would like to, or if you have an idea for it, you can drop a letter off at the Student Development Center, Westside Hall, addressed to Crystal Hoel.

Student Activities Office Has Need for Volunteers

BY ELLEN E. EZZELL
Staff Writer

The UNCW Volunteers program is gearing up to offer students the opportunity to provide services to needy individuals within the community. The program is headed this year by Sarah McKeon, a junior psychology major, who has high expectations for this year's program.

"I feel that it's important for UNCW students to be aware of the community and the problems within it - not just to live in the 'bubble' of the campus. It's the real world," McKeon said.

Students can volunteer to work in a variety of settings, from a school to a hospital to a nursing home. The program is comprehensive and will include work with the elderly, children, rape victims, cancer patients, animals, or families in need. Organizations that need volunteers include Meals on Wheels, American Red Cross, Domestic Violence Shelter, Habitat for Humanity, Salvation Army, Child Advocacy Commission, North Carolina Aquarium, Cape Fear Literacy Council, March of Dimes, as well as several local hospitals, schools, and nursing homes.

There are two steps to becoming involved. After deciding to volunteer time, a student needs to go to the Student Activities Office (IU 202) to decide which organization to volunteer for. Information, contact numbers, and files about the organization and available for a student to look through in helping decide where to devote needed time and energy.

McKeon is planning to hire four or five Student Coordinators to help with recruiting volunteers. Each coordinator will learn and be responsible for one or two organizations. By encouraging students to volunteer for the entire school year, she hopes that the coordinators will help increase the number of long-range volunteers.

Sarah McKeon can be reached Monday through Friday, 2-3 p.m., at 350-3904, or in the her office in the Student Activities Office. She will be glad to help any potential volunteer in any way she can.

Big Buddy was one of many organizations at the Volunteer Fair.

Big Buddies Make a Difference

BY ANGELA CANTERBURY
Staff Writer

The big message delivered Wednesday, Sept. 15 at the Volunteer Fair was that your four, five, or six years spent at UNCW should include more than just classes and keg parties. So what can you do to become more socially responsible? UNCW alumna 1992 and former Seahawk slamdunker, Major Wiggins returned to campus to talk some hoops and spread the news about just how to be a bigger person in the Big Buddy program. The Big Buddy program helps bring kids ages 6-17 in need of a positive relationship together with adults willing to spend a little time being a reliable and trusting friend.

These kids haven't had it easy, but Wiggins and the others committed to the Big Buddy program know that a little one-on-one can make a huge difference in the lives of these little buddies. They attribute the success of these pairings to the sense of self-worth that Big Buddies foster in their kids. A Big Buddy, after six hours of orientation and training, commits to one year of weekly contact with a little buddy that has been carefully matched to the adult. The relationship that follows consists of only four hours per week of positive interaction which could include many activities enjoyed by the buddies.

The program has been incredibly successful, with over three-fourths of the children showing marked progress in school or at home. However, this volunteer-driven, cost effective program is in dire need of some Big Buddies. There are 150 children on a waiting list. Wiggins believes that UNCW students are especially well suited to relating to little buddies and sharing their social activities with them. Although some students on campus are already involved, many more are needed. So even if you don't have some innate altruistic inclinations, you know your resume could use some work and you already spend at least four hours a week on the couch watching Beavis and Butthead. For information on being a big buddy, call Major Wiggins at 251-8330 or 251-8891.

The undefeated Seahawk Soccer team takes on conference foes James Madison (Friday, 4 p.m.) and George Mason (Sunday, 1 p.m.) on Brooks Field.

What Will Stop the Madness?

As the nation and world wonders what is in Florida's water supply that makes its people behave like thugs, idiots, and all around bad apples, the question still remains, what are we to do about the gun problem in this country.

Nine foreign tourists have been killed in the past year, a New York worker on vacation was kidnapped and set on fire, and there were incidents of rock-throwing at cars on the interstate in Florida.

As New York Times Editor Russell Baker pointed out earlier this week, the only reason people seem to be upset by the rash of incidents is it could diminish the flow of tourist dollars in the Florida area ($31 billion last year).

It's time to put an end to not only the bloodshed, but also the argument over gun ownership in this country. The National Rifle Association should agree to this proposal because it reads the text exactly AND represents the spirit of the law as well.

The second amendment states, "A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed."

Now, to most people that statement reads that the inhabitants of this country are guaranteed the right to own a firearm so that the state militia can be maintained. Since the time of this document's writing times have changed. A state militia is no longer necessary (well, maybe in Florida, California, New York, and one for D.C.) because of the National Guard, Reservists, and the regular military, but for the sake of negotiations, let's say a militia is still needed.

Since the N.R.A. wants to interpret the law that way, why don't we state that only weapons that follow the blueprints of the 1791 era ones. Flint-lock rifles and pistols only can be held in households without falling under the regulations and restrictions of the government.

How can the N.R.A. turn that down? It follows the law, allows citizens to have an unlimited number of weapons in their household, and keeps with the spirit of the time the law was written.

Always remember that the writers of the Constitution, a great document, recognized that times will change and laws the founding fathers thought necessary in their day may need to be changed or other rights added put in the document a process for revising the text (Article V).

This document, the basis of our country, was flawed. It originally said that any non-white person only counted as 3/5 of a person (Article I, Section 2).

Are we to assume that if the founding fathers only considered an African American or an Asian American or any other "minority" as only 3/5 of a person, they were also correct in assuming every citizen of this country has a right to own a firearm?

Times have changed and people can no longer be trusted to use firearms in the defense of the country (the original intention of the amendment). It is time the National Rifle Association recognize the greatest cause of death of young African American males under the age of 25 is a bullet, that the streets are no longer safe in many parts of the country, and the country has become trigger-happy.

How many more restaurants are going to become the site of a blood bath? How many more tourists have to die because someone wants their money or is just bored? How many more students will be shot in the hallway of their school? How many more people have to die before some action is taken?

If the only weapon allowed in every household was a musket, everyone would be happy. The Constitution would be followed, everyone would be armed, and everyone would know if someone were carrying around a weapon.

Florida is only in the news now because of the murder of tourists and the economic backlash that could result. Americans have been killing Americans for a long time now, at a much faster rate than we have been killing tourists, and nothing has been done.

Beware Of Wooden Nickels

A wise man once said "beware of wooden nickels." A still wiser man once said "especially beware of wooden nickels found in university pot office boxes and labeled 'Good for 10% discount on any Seahawk apparel at UNCW BOOK-STORE' and depicting to American buffalo on the other side." This wise man, although not an economics major, well understood that 10% of a 110% or so mark-up is not necessarily the best of deals for the impoverished college student. On the other hand, if they are offering free refreshments that you can't eat me in! I must remind you however, that U.S. Senator Jesse Helms (R-North Carolina once said "There is not such thing as a free lunch in this world!"

Speaking of food, I should tell you about my trip across College Road over to the "Grecian Festival" this past weekend. I had never personally tasted a Gyro and thought it would be any chance to become more culturally literate and/or obtain an upset stomach. Now my understanding was that this was supposed to be a Greek event but much to my surprise, there were NO FRATERNITIES OR SORORITIES present! But believe me, all they were lacking was a large wooden horse and I would thought we were in the old country. All during the hour or so I was there, they kept dancing to this one song. There was only one repetitive phrase which sounded like "kikoi ohi marue..." which Star Trek fans will quickly recognize as Klingon for "How long is this blessed dance going to last!!!!"

On the subject of festivities, did anyone bother to attend Fall Convocation? I, being the punctually literate NoBull prize winning columnist that I am, was there at thirty minutes before ten. Parking, as always, was a complete disaster. I was re-routed to a lot somewhere near Carolina Beach so that more important folks (i.e. the bagpipe lady) could park close by Trank Coliseum. I did not mind this however because I happen to like the bagpipe lady and I feel that no convocation and/or Barmazda would be complete without her.

The only other problem I had was with the bugle man. He began to "tune up" at twenty minutes to ten. Could he not stop outside to blow his horn so as to not spoil the effect for the thousands (okay tens) of

Teaching The Unteachable

WASHINGTON—Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.) may have had it right when he decided to back Joycelyn Elders' nomination for surgeon general not because he agrees with her views but because she has the best chance of reaching the people who constitute the country's major health problems.

What Simpson was saying, if I understood him, is that Elders—black, outspoken and female—may have the best chance of persuading the unpersuaded to embrace "safe sex," prenatal care and inoculation against childhood diseases. Further: Reaching that hard-to-reach population is so important as to outweigh Elders' obnoxious (to Simpson) philosophy, her self-righteousness and her propensity for the smart-mouth quip.

Certainly much of the hoopla leading up to Tuesday's (Sept. 7) confirmation hearing had less to do with Elders' beliefs than with her often injudicious expression of those beliefs. It is, possibly, after all, to take a pro-choice position without taking shots at the "celibate, male-dominated (Catholic) church" or urging pro-life advocates to "get over their love affair with the fetus."

George Will

The Coming of a Second Palestinian State

WASHINGTON—Ninety-nine years have passed since Theodor Herzl, appalled by anti-Semitism during the 1894 Dreyfus trial, energized the Zionist movement that produced the Jewish state. Now, it suddenly seems probable that there soon will be a second Palestinian state, of sorts.

What sort? On the answer to that question, the survival of the Jewish state depends.

Jordan is geographically, historically and ethnically a Palestinian state. Like the other 20 nations of the Arab world, Jordan never expressed even the slightest interest in the establishment of another Palestinian state on the West Bank—until Jordan's 1967 aggression against Israel cost Jordan that land. However, the cynicism of the subsequent clamor for such a state is now irrelevant. Israel, by direct and public negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization, has played a card that cannot be unplayed. There shall be a PLO-dominated state carved into Israel's back.

Israel is attempting to trade land for peace. The trouble with such trades is this asymmetry: Israel yields something tangible and gets only promises that might prove as evanescent as Hitler's promise, after Munich, that he had made his last territorial demand.

Bob Haywood

The Challenges Towards Peace

With our days filled up with so many activities, appointments, meetings and work, it is easy to lose sight of global changes and developments. It is even harder to care about what is going on "out there."

Yet the incredible events that have been taking place in the Middle East between Jews and Palestinians can not help but leave us standing slack jawed in wonder about how this has come about. We all know that all humans have a similar hunger for peace and security; but we also know that the "We vs. Them" mentality does too many of the players in the arena of power politics.

It seems to me that something new is taking place in the growth and development of the human family. I admit that I am an optimist. My faith teaches me the value of always living in hope, always looking for signs that the forces for life are gaining strength and power. Still, the tearing down of the Berlin Wall seems to me to be an almost sacramental symbol of change in human consciousness away from the "We vs. Them" thinking that causes wars and peoples living in controlling/oppressive societies. Somehow the power of the human need for freedom and security and an end to war and the threat of war seems to be showing signs of gaining control of the dreams for our individual and common humanity.

Who could have predicted the Berlin Wall would have crumbled as it did. Who could have predicted that Israel and the P.L.O. would have found the beginnings of a passed torch peace. Even with all the incredible anguish of Bosnia/Herzegovina and the struggles of South Africa to move everyone in attendance, he then announced that we "must sell our school" in the future. Yes friends, he said "SELL OUR SCHOOL." I'm surprised that this new was not plastered all over the Morning Star or proclaimed on WECT ("ECT" of course stands for "Extra Credit Television") News the next day. Anyhow, seeing as how I have a tremendous amount of respect for and belief in Chancellor Lutz, I agree that we must sell the school.

The question you must be thinking is "Will there be an auction, or what?" I must admit that I don't have a clue. We could auction it off, sell it building by building, department by department, taking payrol by taking payrol... I DON'T KNOW! What I do know is that we must get top market value and distribute the money equally amongst all...senior Biology majors.

Still, I'm willing to grant Simpson's point. If Elders can use the bully pulpit of the surgeon general's office to get the sexually active to take precautions against pregnancy and disease, if she can talk pregnant teenagers into getting the prenatal care that can improve the chances of their children thriving, if she can get America's young people to abandon some of their wildly unrealistic attitudes toward sexual activity, I'll forgive her her brashness.

But there's another part of the debate that I find troubling—or, rather, I'm troubled because it does not seem to be a significant part of the debate—and that is what might be called the old foggy's point of view. My point of view.

Here it is: It's all very well to try to save people from the disastrous consequences of their behavior, but doesn't it make sense to try to discourage some of the behavior in the first place?

Elders exemplified the problem when she said, on a video presented to the National Commission on Children, these very hip words: "We have had driver's ed for our kids. We've taught them what to do in the front seat of the car, but not what to do in the back seat of the car."

But it isn't just Elders. It's political and civic leaders, educators and journalists, social workers and even preachers. Old fogies believe that some behavior can be and ought to be discouraged. The new—hip—belief is that people will do what people will do, and the only reasonable course is to save them from the consequences.

To striking degree, the problems we worry most about—teen pregnancy, fatherless households, AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, school leaving, infant mortality, even many aspects of poverty—are the consequences of inappropriate sexual behavior.

The hip response is to redouble AIDS research, establish birth-control clinics (and nurseries) in the schools, distribute condoms and clean needles and in general teach kids "what to do in the back of the car."

That's correct. But it is also correct that C. Everett Koop, arguably the most respected surgeon general in the history of the office, achieved that status not by proposing programs and policies to save us from the consequences of cigarette smoking but by trying to curb our smoking habits. To an astonishing degree, he succeeded, and by doing so may have prevented more lung and heart disease than the most generous medical program could ever hope to cure.

Simpson seems to believe that Elders could reach a segment of the population that Koop could never reach and by doing so make headway against a whole slew of problems. I suspect he's right. But a part of the message must be directed not just at the awful consequences but at the deadly behavior itself.

The pragmatic among us will dismiss the entire suggestion as unrealistic and a bit foolish—like tinkering with the barn door long after the horse has fled.

This old foggy thinks it may be well for somebody to remind us that that old horse of responsible personal behavior was a fairly valuable animal, well worth at least trying to reclaim.

it comes to defense. The Palestinians will police their own life, their own community; Israel will remain responsible for the security of Israel and for the security of the Israelis in the territories."

But what comes after the autonomy period, which will be a blink of history? For how long will a Palestinian state fostered by the PLO accept restrictions on its sovereignty regarding the acquisition of military assets and allies—restrictions that violate statehood?

Israel lives in a bad neighborhood which has been inhospitable since Jewish immigration into sparsely populated Palestine accelerated after the Russian pogroms of 1881. Israel's government believes the neighborhood may become much worse unless something is done to slow the spread of Islamic fundamentalism. The government considers this a propitious moment for using the PLO to trigger peace agreements with Jordan and Syria that will dampen fundamentalist fires.

But will the 22nd Arab state be the first Arab democracy? It is more likely to become a cauldron of fundamentalism next door to Tel Aviv.

During the Cold War wise people warned about an asymmetry: America wanted to end the game, the Soviet Union wanted to win it. America won it because the Soviet Union's resolved collapsed as its material strength crumbled. Perhaps something similar has happened to the PLO. Certainly the region has been impacted by the disintegration of the Soviet Union which, in its role as the focus of evil in the modern world, was the arsenal of those for whom the Holocaust is a continuing aspiration.

Palestinians have had execrable leaders. They supported the Ottoman Empire during World War I, Hitler during World War II, the Soviet Union during the Cold War. The PLO's Arafat and Jordan's King Hussein supported Iraq during the Gulf War. Now Israel is betting its life on this: A Palestinian state established by the PLO will have leaders willing to live, for as long as Israel's security requires it, with restrictions on its sovereignty that no other nation accepts.

Some say this amounts to counting on a miracle. Other say there is precedent for miracles in Palestine. It is a risky reliance.

beyond apartheid, even here the struggle is less over oppressive structures. They seem to me to be birth pains of the next stage of evolution in our human family. We are beginning to realize that we are in deed all one human family, that the burning of the Rain Forest in Brazil is our problem; the economy of Russia will impact us, etc. Eminence and control are beginning to yield to genuine struggles of collaboration between people with diverse concerns and commitments. That the shift has begun that I am glad.

In the world writ small in the seven hundred acres of UNCW, we would do well to cultivate two dynamics in our lives. Let us, first, be people of hope, people who look for any and all signs of birth of new possibilities among us it is all to easy to go to sleep. What else but the University Police Dept., partly because of my fondness for the squad, and even more so because it is about the only thing I could afford without dipping into my savings account. Anyhow, I hope they wait until after May, 1994 to sell out because if the sale is open to anyone I may well be graduating from the "Lisa Kellogg University." We just couldn't have that!

Has Off this week go to one Neal Richardson who recently became a manager for the Seahawk basketball program, and who I'm sure will help me get tickets to away games. Neal also hosts a radio show on UNCW Campus radio (WLOZ cable 97.3) each Sunday night from 9:00-11:00 pm, upon which I have made guest appearances. "Has Off" to Neal for a job well done.

The Shoes Off award for this week is Secondly, we have a lot of work to do right here to "Break down the Dividing Walls of Hostility" for we are, in our own unique situation a collection of diverse peoples. Homophobia, Racism, Sexism, Ageism are forces that separate us and breed hostility right here right now. Each one of us has needs to work with ourselves and beyond ourselves, and to work in this community to discover the reality behind labels we apply to others.

Let us be peace makers where we live. extended to Dr. Larry Cable (sorry Dr. C) for not showing up to receive his "1993 Chancellor's Teaching Excellence" award at Convocation. Although Dr. Cable is one of my favorite professors here at "Seahawk High" (a phrase I believe he coined) I must issue him "Shoes Off" since I showed up for his award and he didn't. Besides, he uses to pick on my writings in class and so I owe him one.

Folks, that's about all for this week. Time again for more exciting adventures!! Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

And In This Corner... The Day That Rocked Wilmington

Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

On August 19, 1993, D. Neal Leeper committed a faux-pas.

According to the "Letter's To The Editor" section of the August 26, 1993 The Seahawk newspaper, Vern Granger brought a serious matter to everyone's attention. Here is an excerpt from his letter:

"Leeper's article has shown a violation of one of the basic rules of journalism—reporting of the facts. Here are just a couple of blunders. Error number 1—if he would have bothered to go to the front and ask the person in charge of the tickets, he would have discovered that there were over 250, instead of the 150 people that he reported. Another error of reporting of the facts I found in the article was the fact that he said he was the only media member who covered the show. If he would have been backstage earlier, (which I might add a good journalist should do anyway) and just asked someone such as myself, or Alden Blake, or Frank Tascone, he would have discovered that in fact, the Star-News did an article in Monday's edition, and WECT, 10 Star-News, and Surf 107 all did work on the show."

Granger continues: "In his article, it seemed like he had a field day on Jimmie Walker. Instead of commenting on Walker's material in the show, he thought the 'hard news' dealt with Walker's attire."

And finally: "The r_____ word in journalism might have just reared its ugly head in this place."

I would like to comment on a few of these points.

First of all, I admit I was in the wrong. There were in fact an estimated 250 patrons attending the Jimmy Walker and Randy Kagan concert on August 17th, 1993. I reported 150. Sorry. It just seemed like such a small amount of people for a theater that holds 999. According to Frank Tascone of ACE, of those 250 patrons (plus or minus a few), only 225 (plus or minus ten or so) paid. The total revenue from the concert was $1,090.00. When you take into consideration that the students of The University of North Carolina at Wilmington paid (through their tuition) Jimmy Walker $6,000.00 (plus expenses, we only lost around $4,900.00 on the deal. To put this into perspective folks, for a forty minute performance, Walker earned $162.00 a minute (plus or minus a couple bucks). You would think that with that kind of money, Walker could of at least bought a new pair of shoes to go with his sweat pants.

Oops... I faux-pas'd again! I forgot about Kagan! We paid Randy Kagan $3,500.00 (plus expenses) for his performance, which, I might add, was longer and better than Walker's. So, the total amount we lost on the whole deal was only around $8,300.00.

Secondly, I didn't see the folks from the other news agencies because I wanted to wait until the performers arrived. I can recall attempting to go backstage several times, but the performers had not yet arrived. Is that why the show began thirty-two minutes late?

Thirdly, I reported on the attire that Walker chose to wear because it stuck out more than his show. Believe it or not, when I interviewed Walker before the concert began, he was actually writing his material on the spot. The stuff was not THAT funny.

And finally, the r_____ word in journalism? Please don't call me a radish.

But don't get me wrong, I like ACE. Frank Tascone said to me the other day, "We are trying desperately to do things for students. We wanted Jamie Fox (In Living Color)—but that fell through." Oh well, I understand what you are doing over there—just try to understand what I'm doing over here.

Vern, I hope that clears up some of my "blunders." The Seahawk office received a letter from a fellow in the Arizona State Prison the other day. His letter reads: "I am a prisoner on death row at the Arizona State Prison and was wondering if you would do me a favor. I have been here for over sixteen years and no longer have family or friends on the outside that write. I was wondering if you would put a small ad in the campus newspaper for me asking for people to correspond with. If you are unable to do that, perhaps you have some type of bulletin or message board that you could put it on. I realize that you are not a pen pal club or anything like that, but it would really help me out and I would greatly appreciate it."

Now, this message touched the hearts of all Seahawk staff members, especially the Sports Editor, Erik Totten. If you are interested in writing this fellow to learn of "new experiences and an exchange of ideas," you can do so by writing: "Jim Jeffers, Box B-38604, Florence, Arizona, 85232."

DISCLAIMER Please note, members of The Seahawk staff do NOT condone any behavior that would cause someone to end up on death row. If you write this guy, do so at your own risk. Inmate Jeffers just wanted us to do a little favor for him. Anything to brighten someone's life. But, if you write Mr. Jeffers, you have to write me when I end up in jail.

On the brighter side of things, anyone see The Chevy Chase Show? Oops, I meant on the darker side. I guess watching the The Chevy Chase Show is a lot like death row. Oh well. Sorry—the show sucks. That's all that really has to be said.

Jeff Watkins, a close correspondent for The Seahawk, was the only person in Wilmington that watched to Conan O'Brien Show.

Oops, there were probably a few more watching the show, so please, Vern, don't write another letter. (Just kidding!)

Anyway, Jeff informs me that Conan "used a lot of old Letterman take offs. It didn't come across like Letterman, he didn't have the persona. Considering I watched about ten minutes of it, it sucked."

There you have it. Straight from Jeff's mouth.

Well folks, that's really all that's on my mind today. I hope I cleared up all the blunders and boo-boo's that have plagued the campus for the past couple weeks.

Until next time!

The beautiful, historic town of Wilmington, North Carolina got rocked this past Saturday. "By what?" you may ask? Well, of course, since UNCW has no football team, they didn't get rocked in that matter (like Clemson). But I won't go into that right now.

Hurricane Wagoner didn't slam Wilmington either, although many of you may disagree with me on this, if you've eaten there lately.

No, the answer is simple. Wilmington got rocked by not one, but two rock-n-roll concerts on the same day.

The first, entitled Full Tilt, could be considered the warm-up. The Full Tilt line-up consisted of three bands: Cravin' Melons, Fluid Grind, and, as usual, Dillon Fence. Due to my strenuous part-time job, I was unable to attend this show. It must have been great though, considering the inebriated state I found several of my suite mates in when I got off work.

My fun began around 10 PM when I arrived at The Mad Monk to see Queen Sarah Saturday and The Connells. To my surprise, the ever-present Melons were on stage playing a pretty cool set of blues-inspired alternative rock. At this point in time, the crowd seemed like a bunch of zombies, still recovering from Full Tilt.

At about 11 PM, Durham's Queen Sarah Saturday jumped out on stage and banged out several songs from their current EP, as well as some from their upcoming album. They were extremely loud and charismatic, immediately waking the crowd and igniting a pit full of moshers. I must admit I wasn't very familiar with many of Queen Sarah Saturday's songs, but they were good enough to make me curious about their EP.

The Connells finally took the stage about midnight, starting things off with a cool tune off their new album, scheduled for release September 21st.

I was anxious to hear the new songs, but, like most everyone else, found myself enjoying their old stuff the best, like "Something to Say," "Stone Cold Yesterday," "Get a Gun," and "Inside my Head."

The Connells nicely worked in six or seven brand new songs in their one and a half hour set, including two encores. Highlights included "Choose A Side," featuring excellent drumming from Peele Wimberley, "Fun + Games," a real crowd and (surprise) pit pleaser. My favorite Connells song, "Hat's Off," a standout track from their debut album "Darker Says" closed the show at about one-thirty.

Although their music was fine, The Connells seem to possess very little stage presence other than Doug McMillan's goofy mannerisms and friendliness to the crowd. The other members seemed stagnant and unenthused, especially Peele Wimberley, whose eyes never seemed to look up from his drums.

My only other complaint is that the band should have hired someone to play the trumpet on their classic "over there" instead of replacing it with a wanky sounding electric guitar. But this is a small complaint and, judging from the crowd's reaction, The Connells succeeded in putting on a great show.

School Bus. Go see them.

Wednesday night. For those of you on a budget, try Musser's Scafold on Market Street: half-price appetizers and $3.50 pitchers of beer. Nice waitresses. From there, get someone to drive you to Red Dogs.

For those of you who have been living in a hole for the past few years, every Wednesday and Sunday night, Red Dogs offers free beer. FREE BEER! The only catch is no one in the place can pee or leave. Once that occurs, the free stuff is gone. Two points: I love this concept! It's sick, but then, so am I. #2: Mental Note: you do not want to be the person who blows it for everyone else. Start bladder exercises now. Also, do not try and drive home after this event.

Thursday night. Mad Monk. Hootie and the Blowfish Return! I could go on and on about how good this band is. They are well worth your dinero. If you caught the show, you were probably accosted by my roommate. He had just a few beers....

Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. I spent a lot of time at The Icehouse. Flamenco Jazz and some blues, along with cheap Killian's Red. Having a view of the river always makes me feel comfortable. I think of Huck and Jim and their adventures. Let the water take me away....

Monday. Rock N' Roast. Old friends. Even cheaper beer. Messed up as a football bat. Chi Chi's and free wings. Break time and good friends. Go 'Skins. Damn, you Cowboys fans gotta hate it!

This was a whirlwind week and I need some rest. My liver hurts and my band account is now a thing of the past. Take some time to recover from the long weekend folks, you deserve. Right before you fall to sleep, in that period of half-awareness, look closely into the shadows. You can find me there, on my way out the door, groping in the darkness.

Editor's Note: Killian's Red is the best beer produced.

Amen Brother!

On Ruby Tuesday, September 7th, a little bit of hell was raised on stage at the Mad Monk. I was a little excited about the project. I was broke and starving for entertainment. The Monk was cheap—3 bands for $3 and the beer was even cheaper, a nickel. No wooden ones accepted.

The first band was Wilmington's own Buzzjunkies. These guys are a lot of fun. A rolling ball of fun, if you will. Their brand of "psycho-billy" was an early spark that ignited the large crowd already in attendance. I have never been disappointed by these guys. Besides, you have to love a band with a bassist that plays an upright.

The second band, the Prycnone Rang- ers, was just a little bit puzzling. Musically, they were good, lyrically they were better, by the crowd just didn't seem to like them. I think the lead vocalist might have alienated the masses by referring to them as "skinheads" and announcing "we don't want any of you procreate." I don't think The Rangers were briefed on what kind of crowd to expect. When they finished, one marine was spotted telling "you suck, you suck" while gesticulating wildly and spilling beer on himself. This just proves maybe, one of the reasons The Rangers didn't want the audience to procreate.

The final band, The Reverend Horton Heat, a three man band out of Texas took the stage to a big crowd. I have never seen these guys before and I was impressed. The Reverend preached his own brand of religion to the assembled congregation with the zeal of hellfire and brimstone.

I half expected The Monk to burst into flames, but then I realized that had been done before.

The band looked like they had stepped out of the set of Grease. I didn't see the rest of the T-Birds but I'm sure they were about. I think that the drummer, I'm not sure, was that big guy, Meatloaf. You never know where he's going to show up.

All in all, a good night of music. Go see the Buzzjunkies and Reverend Horton Heat next time they come around. The Prycnone Rangers are a tougher call, but live music is always better than TV.

Just go, go, go man and you'll probably see me on a rolling out the door looking for the best minds of my generation and howling at the moon.

The Psychology behind the Citibank Classic Visa card, and the emotional security of the Photocard.

The Citibank Classic Visa® instills in students feelings of safety, security, and general wellness not unlike those experienced in the womb. Therefore, it is the mother of all credit cards. ¶ Some experts attribute these feelings to the Citibank Photocard, the only credit card with your photo on it. A voice inside says, "This is me, really me." (As opposed to, "Who the heck is that?"—a common response to the photo on one's driver's license.) It's an immediate form of ID, a boost to your self-image. ¶ Of course if your card is ever lost or stolen and a stranger is prevented from using it, you'll feel exceptionally good (showing no signs of Credit Card Theft Nervosa). ¶ Other experts point to specific services, such as The Lost Wallet™ Service that can replace your card usually within 24 hours. Or the 24-Hour Customer Service line, your hotline, if you will, for any card-related anxiety whatsoever. ¶ Further analysis reveals three services that protect the purchases you make on the Citibank

Subject suffering from Credit Card Theft Nervosa.

Classic Visa card, at no additional cost. 1. Buyers Security™ can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase¹ (preventing, of course, Insecurity). 2. Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ allows one to extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.² 3. And Citibank Price Protection assures you of the best price. You need only see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150¹ (hence no Post Purchase Depression). ¶ Special student savings are particularly therapeutic. There's the free Citibank Calling Service™ from MCI to save up to 26% on long distance calls versus AT&T.³ (You're encouraged to call Mom and Dad regularly preventing Parenta Non-Supportus.) And a $20 Airfare Discount⁴ on any domestic flight. (Case studies indicate that a Fear of Flying is overcome when Spring Break in sunny Florida is a possibility.) Not to mention the low variable interest rate of 15.4%⁵ and no annual fee for college students. ¶ Suffice it to say, you'll have a credit card you can depend on while building a credit history. So call 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19, to apply over the phone (students don't need a job or a cosigner) or to have your photo added to your Citibank Classic Visa card. ¶ If we say that a sense of Identity is the first component of the Citibank Classic Visa card, a sense of Security the second, and a sense of Autonomous Will from your newfound financial independence the third, don't be crazy...Call.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Volunteers Needed for United Way "Fix Up Day"

This Saturday, from 8:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m., is "Fix Up Day." This unprecedented event will mobilize scores of local people in the Cape Fear Area to help local United Way human service agencies through personal involvement and community service. Participants will perform tasks at United Way agencies such as painting rooms, landscaping, light construction, and athletic field clean-up and repair, and more. The event will give area volunteers an opportunity to see where their United Way donations go and see first hand how it helps our local people, while enabling agencies to improve their facilities in a cost effective way.

UNCW will have a team of volunteers participating in the fix-up event, which concludes with a Volunteer Recognition Lunch and Press Conference at Emile Park. This will kick off the 1993 United Way fund drive throughout the Cape Fear Area, which includes Brunswick, New Hanover and Pender Counties. Students, faculty, and their families are invited to be part of UNCW's "Fix-Up Team." contact Linda Moore, Director of the University Union, University Union Room 214, at 395-3283, for details. Be a part of a hands-on experience to help social agencies serve our community more effectively!

The First SGA Weekend Retreat

BY KRISTY SHUMAKER
 SGA

SGA held its first weekend retreat Sept. 17-19 at Camp Tuscarora in Newton Grove to orientate newly elected Freshman class officers into student government.

"This weekend we learned that as members of SGA we are responsible for every student on this campus," Freshman class President Nate Stansfield said Monday. "We learned about the Fundamentals of SGA and came up with ideas for events geared toward freshmen. For example, we discussed offering a freshmen week, with seminars such as Freshman Survival and Freshman Finances."

"But most importantly we learned that every person on this campus is vital to the success of the school. As President of the Freshman class, I want to see that each student is taken care of. I want to be a strong voice and to make sure there is a strong sense of unity and camaraderie among freshmen."

"This is the basic theme for our class this year. I plan to talk to students and find out their wants and needs and to see these visions become a reality."

Vice President Kristen "Doc" Dougherty said she thought the retreat was a good opportunity to get to know other SGA members and learn how to work together to represent student interests.

"I will be working with the Health and Wellness Committee and the Judiciary Board," Dougherty said Tuesday. "But one of my main goals this year is to work with the Sophomore and Junior classes to get more activities geared toward freshmen."

Senator Jenn Maxwell said Tuesday, "This was a good time to get to know one another and learn how to act as ago-between for students and SGA. I will be working with the Student Grievance Board and the Chancellor's Aides Advisory Council. I am her to listen to complaints and new ideas." Maxwell added that she would like to see more students voting and involved in all facets of government.

Attorney General Kevin Smith said, "The retreat went really well and we got a lot accomplished. It was a good chance for everybody to get to know each other and develop a closer working relationship. It should help improve our current services and deliver the ones students are asking for."

Current SGA offerings include a campus recycling program, consentment bookstore, discount movie tickets, student discount cards for use at local businesses and legal counseling. SGA also provides funding for campus media and various social and academic organizations. In addition, ACEA committee of student government, is active in bringing lectures, concerts and comedians to the UNCW campus.

Phil Feiner, Student Services Coordinator, said other projects in the works included mock GMAT and GRA testing and a course descriptor which would list all university courses by name and instructor.

SGA also works with Enrollment Management to help link people already on campus with incoming students through the Little Seahawk program. The Little Seahawk program is designed to orientate freshmen and transfer students with academic responsibilities and to provide membership in social and athletic clubs.

Feiner said, "It's like we're on this mission and the end goal is to have a full-blown campus community."

"Right now we have an incredible problem with apathy. Our so-called campus community is nonexistent. We have an information void. The only true access of information is through the newspaper which only comes out once a week. Organizations and clubs try in vain to advertise through banners and fliers. Our main goal this year is to link information so that students can have a unified understanding of what is going on here at UNCW."

Freshman class Senator Bruce Hunter did not attend the SGA retreat at Camp Tuscarora and was unavailable for comment.

Beach Sweep '93

BY HEATHER M. WOODSON
 Staff Writer

Despite the somewhat unpredictable weather, Beach Sweep '93 went off without a hitch. This nationwide event, coordinated locally by Keep America Beautiful of New Hanover County, was held on Saturday, September 18, 1993 from 9 a.m. until noon. Goals of the event are not only to remove trash from our beaches that could be harmful to wildlife or visually displeasing, but also to promote awareness about the problem of beach debris. Several UNCW students helped with this effort, including contingents from the Biology Club and the Ecological Concerns Organization (ECO) who took part in the clean-up effort on Mansboro Island. Transportation to the island and an abundance of refreshments were provided by Southern Bell. In New Hanover County 700 volunteers participated in picking up 11,000 pounds of trash. Many thanks to all those who helped make this event a success. See you next year!

Embezzlement In Physical Plant

COMPILED BY AMY BRENNAN
 NEWS EDITOR

Three employees at the UNCW physical plant were fired earlier this month after university officials discovered over $40,000 in paint and supplies missing.

Painting supervisor Leonard Warren, was fired after university police arrested him and charged him with embezzlement. Two of his supervisors were fired as well. James Mathis Jr., assistant director of the physical plant, was fired for misconduct based on gross negligence. Roger Fry, director of physical plant administration, was fired for misconduct based on negligence.

J. Carl Dempsey, associate vice chancellor for business affairs-facilities, was demoted to director of construction. This decision was based on state and university personnel policy.

Dempsey has been at UNCW for 26 years.

The problem was discovered after the Duron paint store where UNCW paint and supplies are purchased called, and said that Warren might be abusing his privilege to buy paint with open purchase orders.

University police, working with the State Bureau of Investigation, and the District Attorney's Office recovered $174 worth of paint and arrested Willie McLean on charges of receiving stolen goods. McLean is not a university employee.

The fired employees have until Friday, Sept. 24 to file grievances. Mathis said he and Fry were considering doing so. Mathis said, "I'd like the truth to come out." He has been working at UNCW since Sept. 1978. Fry has been at UNCW since June 1981. Before coming to UNCW, Fry was in charge of the city of Wilmington's water and sewer system.

Don Norris, electrical supervisor, has taken over Mathis' duties. Tim Jordan, assistant vice chancellor of business affairs-finance, will act in the interim for Dempsey and Fry until those positions are filled.

Since all university employees are covered by a surety bond, the bonding company will pay the university for the missing paint and supplies.

This story based on reports from the Star News.

Don't miss the next UNCW Soccer game Wednesday, Sept. 29, as the 6-1 Seahawks take on the hated Wolfpack of N.C. State. UNCW won last year's contest 3-2.

Feminist Colloquium Discusses Women's Support Group

BY FIONA RICE
Staff Writer

Contemporary issues of gender are the topic of a student discussion group that meets monthly on campus.

The Feminist Colloquium chooses a reading concerning gender in our society at the beginning of each meeting. An informal discussion on the subject follows at the next meeting.

Dr. Janet Ellerby started the group in the Fall of 1992. She wanted to offer students, faculty, staff, and administration a forum to discuss gender issues.

The Feminist Colloquium will hold its first meeting October 1st from 3-4 p.m. The meetings are open to everyone on campus and welcomes men as well as women.

The meetings are held in the Faculty Common in Morton Hall. The Faculty Common is located across from the English Department Office on the first floor.

Dr. Lindsay Aegerter, Assistant Professor of English, will lead the first meeting in a discussion on issues of identity. Companion essays, "Coming to Speech" and "If I Could Write In Fire, I Would Write In Fire," by Michelle Cliff, will be discussed.

Two of last year's readings come from Susan Faludi's Backlash and Naomi Wolf's The Beauty Myth.

Some previous issues the group has discussed include the representation of women in the media, advertising and fashions and how women can work toward a more equal place in the working world.

Ben and Jerry's Ice Cream sponsored a meeting last year after receiving a letter from Dr. Ellerby. She wrote to them around the time Wilmington was receiving publicity from the Cray Prigden incident. Dr. Ellerby explained that her group was concerned with gender issues and with a positive image for feminists. Ben and Jerry's responded with coupons for 10 quarts of ice cream.

At the first meeting Dr. Ellerby will discuss plans for a women's support/discussion group. A tentative name for the group is the Women's Cooperative. The group will informally discuss the pressures, challenges and frustrations women on campus face. This group will also be open to anyone on campus and will welcome men as well as women.

Dr. Ellerby is an Assistant Professor of English in her fourth year at UNCW. She has taught classes called Women in Literature, Gender in Modernism, and The Female Tradition.

If you would like more information on the Feminist Colloquium or the Women's Cooperative, call Dr. Janet Ellerby at 395-3764 in the English Department.

UNCW Helps Fix Up

BY ERICA BRANDON
Staff Writer

United Way's annual September event, "Fix Up Day" was a great success over the past weekend.

Saturday, September 18, the UNCW team of volunteers, headed by Linda Moore, went to United Way Cape Fear, to offer their services. Once there they were put to work by completing an inventory of supplies.

After the volunteer efforts were over for that day, all the volunteers went to Empire Park for a Volunteer Recognition Lunch and Press Conference.

The team of UNCW volunteers consisted of one student, Crystal Gasperson, and four staff members.

Crew Team Rescue

BY AMY BRENNAN

The UNCW Crew team helped carry two men to shore on Saturday, Sept. 18 after the men fell out of their 12-foot john boat. According to Star News reports, the men were fishing on the Cape Fear River when a barge passed and swamped the overloaded boat carrying Mack Lynnwood Brown, his brother, Larry Brown, and friend, Gene Melvin.

According to crew team member Marciana Paak, the men in the john boat had been drinking heavily at the when team member Chris Triplett attempted to help the men into his boat, they seemed more concerned about their beer than about getting out of the water.

The Star News reported that Larry Brown was charged with operating a boat while impaired. He blew a 0.21 on a blood alcohol test, more than twice the legal limit to operate a vehicle. A case of unopened Budweiser was found in the river near the area where the boat sank.

The body of Mack Brown was found Monday, Sept. 20 near a creek which flows from Greenfield Lake into the Cape Fear River. The body was sent to Chapel Hill for an autopsy to confirm the identification and to possibly gather criminal evidence against Larry Brown in News reported on Tuesday, Sept. 21.

Paak said that at the time of the rescue, the two men did not mention that there was a third person in the boat with them.

Early Release or The Death Penalty

WASHINGTON—At one end of the crime lab are the penal mathematicians, groping for the perfect schedule of punishments that will maximize deterrence and minimize the taxpayers burden.

At the other sit the social engineers, whose quest is the precise set of social conditions that will eliminate the temptation to lawlessness.

Each group has a case to make. The mathematicians are persuaded that for punishment to be effective, the anticipation cost must outweigh the expected benefit of any particular crime. If the other offense of taking the company's felt-tip pens home from the office meant dismissal, you'd remember to check your pockets at the end of the day. If the only punishment for never paying your income tax was a week in jail, you and I might be taking a jail experience.

The engineers accept the value of punishment, but they note that since different people respond differently to the same punishment, something besides punishment must influence the decision to commit crime.

They think they know what it is. Social conditions—deprivation, abuse, the absence of resources or faulty parenting. It's madness, they say to try to figure out what threat of punishment will keep a hungry child from stealing food, or prevent a desperately poor parent from buying from the "hot man." Re-engineer the environment, they argue, and crime will take care of itself.

For some years, now the mathematicians have held sway—not by producing a table of optimum sentences but by persuading the public that leniency is the problem, it follows with mathematical certainty that tougher sentencing is the cure. Thus we've had longer sentences, mandatory minimums—even a growing demand for the death penalty. What we've not had is a reduction in crime.

As a result, the social engineers may be poised for a comeback.

Probably the main reason for their resurgence (assuming it really does happen) is money. Economically troubled California, to take just one example, is so extended with incarceration and other criminal-justice costs that it hardly has the money to educate its children. And since the link between poor education and crime is undeniable, even by the mathematicians, prevention starts to look more attractive.

But there are other reasons, including the growing sense that the mathematicians were chasing a chimera all along. There is nothing the criminal justice system can do that will have much effect on crime rates.

This is one of the points driven home by a newly released policy statement from the National Council on Crime and Delinquency, "Reducing Crime in America: A Pragmatic Approach."

"The most effective crime-reduction strategy must focus on social and economic factors known to be related to high crime rates," the San Francisco-based think tank concludes in what sounds like a throwback to the largely discredited "roots of crime" notions of the 1960's (or in my crime-lab analogy, the engineers).

The NCCD calls for a 10-year approach to crime reduction and offers separate lists of immediate and long-term proposals.

Among the near-term recommendations is this one: "Prison sentences should be principally reserved for three types of offenders: (a) first-time felons who have committed a violent or heinous crime, (b) felons with a prior felony conviction whose crimes involve a substantial threat to public safety, and (c) felons whose crimes involve substantial violations of the public trust."

Most other offenders would be given non-prison punishments, and drug enforcement—a major contributor to prison overcrowding—would shift its emphasis from interdiction to treatment. Long-term objectives would include reducing early and unwanted pregnancies, providing better health care for children and interventions to improve school success.

The obvious objections are that the near-term proposals amount to more mollycoddling of non-violent criminals (with the prospect of creating more of them) and that the long-term proposal are both costly and of uncertain efficacy.

A short while ago such objections might have carried the day. But—slowly and reluctantly—we are coming to understand two elusive truths. The first is that, after a point already long passed, additional harshness simply doesn't work. As someone once put it, if incarceration prevents crime, Washington, D.C. would be the safest city in the history of the world.

The second is that the most effective deterrent to crime (and to drug abuse, teen pregnancy and many of the other problems that concern us) is confidence in the future.

Youngsters who believe in their prospects for the future tend not to screw up in the first place, and when they do they tend to get quickly back on track.

Overwhelmingly, the problem of crime and other improvident behavior is the problem of young people who think they have nothing to lose.

The mathematicians can't fix that. Maybe—just maybe—the engineers can.

Ziggy Wants You To Vote

BY ZIGGY NIX
SGA President

On Nov. 2, 1993, the citizens of North Carolina will be asked to make a decision. The decision is a bond referendum that will affect North Carolina in many different ways. There are four main items on the bond. They are university improvements, community colleges, water and sewer projects, and state park systems. The item on the bond that will directly affect us, the students of UNCW, is the college improvements item.

What is our stake in the bond issue? A new physical science building, renovating DeLoach Hall, and adding a wing on Bear Hall. Our campus desperately needs lab space and some more classrooms.

What happens if the bond referendum doesn't pass? Since our university is getting increasingly popular, we need more space for classrooms and labs. If the problem of lab space is not solved soon, we will be faced with having labs on Saturdays. Something that I don't feel anyone should have to do. Classrooms will be overflowing affecting the education that we pay for.

What do you need to do as a student? If you're a resident of North Carolina, register to vote by Oct. 11. If you're not registered to vote in New Hanover, vote by absentee ballot in your respective county.

The time is right. Interest rates are at their lowest levels in more than 20 years, construction costs are very favorable, and North Carolina's per capita debt is among the lowest of all states. Even the State Treasurer recommends and endorses passage of the bonds. It will not increase our taxes if it passes.

The University of North Carolina has given us a chance to grow, so we should give the University of North Carolina a chance to grow.

The Deteriorating Infra-Structure of The U.S. Public Education System

WASHINGTON—Several public school systems are starting late, forcing parents to seek day care and children to seek alternative sources of free condoms.

For the fifth time in 10 years Chicago's schools opened late, a disruption the teachers union might face less placidly if about half the teachers with school-age children did not send them to private schools. New York's schools with open in a few days, maybe. Their problem is asbestos, as explained in a New Yorker magazine editorial that combines proper indignation with obtuseness.

It reports that asbestos tests have been so incompetent and probably fraudulent that "the results were virtually meaningless." Perhaps a third of the tests were fabricated. After 14 years and more than $10 million spent on asbestos abatement, the Board of Education could not tell parents even which schools had been inspected, let alone which were safe.

While the city's 1,069 schools are being reinspected, and made safe from whatever the asbestos risk is (estimates vary widely), children are in private homes, public housing, day care centers, office buildings and churches throughout the city. Trouble is, the city government says that about 544,000 of the 800,000 buildings in the city contain asbestos. In about 90 percent of those the asbestos is exposed because of the decay of the building. The New Yorker wonders whether children might be safer in asbestos-contaminated schools than in other buildings, or in streets where stray—that's right, stray—bullets often kill children.

The risk of dying prematurely from asbestosis because of exposure in schools estimated as about one-third the risk of being struck by lightning, 1,600 times less likely than death in a car accident, 22,000 times less likely than death from smoking. And of course the risk of asbestosis is much less than the risk of being shot or stabbed to death in a New York public school. At a recent protest rally of parents a sign said "Kids are back in school in Sarajevo." Yes, and in Sarajevo the guns are outside the schools.

The New Yorker notes that most asbestos in the schools would not be exposed to the air of the schools were not decaying under the inattention of the Division of School Facilities, which "has produced spectacular nepotism and a backlog of 44,000 unfilled work orders." Perhaps there is that backlog because custodians are kept too busy by contracts requiring them, for example, to mop hallways and classrooms three times a year. A custodian in one of the division's own buildings was especially busy, conducting a second career on school time, from his yacht.

The New Yorker blames the shambles of the public schools partly on the school board, which the magazine angrily says devoted "most of its energy" for two years to "an idiotic wrangle over a few hundred words" in a proposed curriculum. The magazine demurely and approvingly says that the curriculum "advocated teaching tolerance for gays." But one reason for the public's withdrawal of confidence from the city's public schools is that they seem preoccupied with sexual propaganda—decreasing when grammar school children shall read "Heather Has Two Mommies" and learn about anal sex—while buildings crumble, bullets ricochet and incompetent bureaucrats and rapacious unions prosper.

In Washington, where many national politicians are more eager to protect public education from competition than they are to send their children to public schools, the schools opened with a debate about an "Afrocentricism" project. Designed by a woman who awarded herself a master's degree from the "university" she founded, the Afrocentric teaching she seems to produce a "nurturing environment" conducive to "self-esteem" by challenging the idea that Europe is the source of Western civilization.

The Washington Post quoted Russell Adams, chairman of Howard University's Department of African-American Studies, to review the woman's materials. He had his senior seminar read them. He says, "they were speechless. And then they said, 'Please, they cannot be serious.'"

This episode, and the New York debacle, and the locked doors in Chicago that required a court order to unlock this week, and last week's report on the nation's staggering illiteracy problem, and many other reflections on public education should be on the minds of California voters in November. They will vote on a voucher system that would empower parents to choose between public and private schools.

Public school lobbyists warn darkly that this might lead to the creation of some private schools that would not meet the high standards of public school systems. About those lobbyists, Californians should say, "Please, they cannot be serious."

WWAY's Censorship Keeps Up the Stereotype

Tuesday night, WWAY-TV decided that the Wilmington community was not mature enough to decide for itself whether or not the new ABC show NYPD Blue was too violent, nude, or foul-mouthed so it did not air the show.

Thank you so much WWAY for censoring the airways for us. NOT!

Perhaps if the station's general manager had believed in the adage "You can't judge a book by its cover," she would have decided to air the show on a trial basis and let the public decide what it will or will not watch.

What is really disturbing about WWAY's decision not to air NYPD Blue is that had Vision Cable not aired the show on its empty channels, the show would not have been available in the Wilmington area.

Television stations are federally regulated. Nowhere is there a town with two ABC affiliates. If the local affiliate decides not to air a show because it doesn't agree with the network's decision to air the program, that community served by that affiliate goes without.

Some may say that WWAY's decision not to air the show is similar to a newspaper's decision not to run a letter or an article. It is not. A newspaper does not prevent the writer from publishing the letter or article elsewhere in the market. WWAY prevented a large number of people from viewing a program its network deemed appropriate for a national audience.

Eastern North Carolina has the reputation of being a backwater area, ruled by old money and the churches. This incident is just a reinforcement of that stereotype.

WKYC, Wilmington's CBS affiliate aired the TV movie Donato and Daughter, starring Charles Bronson and Dana Delaney. According to Matt Roush of USA Today, the movie included "the body count of four mutilated nuns and a pregnant cop shot in the belly."

Why are television station managers so worried about a few seconds of sex and a few cuss words when there is murder and mayhem on every night?

Just one more thought on the subject: WWAY aired the series Who's the Boss? for a number of years. The premise of that show was an unmarried woman who ran her own business, earning at least six figures, had an unmarried male housekeeper. The show was named Who's the Boss? If that roles had been reversed where a single rich male lived with a single woman, would the show have had the same title? Doubtful.

I guess WWAY and the vocal self-righteous community of Wilmington don't mind the airing of shows that "keep women in their place."

O.K. just one more thought, where was the Morning Star during this controversy? One instructor on this campus who has lived in big television and newspaper markets said it is probably because the paper doesn't want to portray any part of the community, other than the government, in a negative light.

On Wilmington, grow up. Let us decide for ourselves if we want to watch a program the network has deemed O.K. for broadcasting.

In The Relentless Search of A Significant Other

I just returned from a weekend retreat around the theme of "Friendship". Having and being friends is important to all of us. And while it is easy to name the qualities important in a friendship, it is not so easy to act out those qualities in the face of our own needs and fears.

One of the dynamics in the friends of young adults is that any relationship with a member of the opposite sex is complicated because of the agenda we bring to it. Most people want to have a boyfriend or a girlfriend and are, at some level, looking for that person with whom they might spend the rest of their lives in marriage. When we enter a room full of people, we scan the persons present and identify some that we would like to get to know. If "Getting to know" is a good experience, we then move on through getting more acquainted, spending time together, sharing more and more of ourselves, having our feelings for this person get stronger, feeling closer, getting turned on and dealing with all that, making decisions about whether to make love or not and frequently dealing with anguish brought upon by relationship ending.

There seems to be a kind of extricable pattern to male female relationships, an internal dynamic that pushes us on from that first encounter on to an ever increasing intensity and depth, a hunger generated by our need to be in relationship with a significant other.

My conviction, after the discussion of this weekend, is that we miss a lot in relationships when we get caught up in all of the emotional forces of a developing relationship. We particularly miss a lot in the area of intimacy which is, too often, a phase we move quickly through to the deeper encounters generated by our sexuality. I emerged from the retreat with the con-vinction that experiences of intimacy can stand alone as a value to be sought in relationships.

Intimacy connotes a sense of connection between two people that has feelings of depth and acceptance and appreciation. In our cruise to the Bahamas, a community exists for one week and in those days lies a whole series of encounters between persons that can be characterized as intimate because of the level of sharing that takes place, because of the sense of being surrounded by so much beauty and because of the freedom from expectations in relationships built in by the very nature of the cruise. Also, I have had serious conversations that became a deeper encounter with another human being while traveling on an airplane and while never seeing that person again, the human memory of that conversation remains. Personal crisis also offers a chance for intimate sharing that has value and positive effects for the helper and helped.

I could also talk of moments of significant intimacy walking by myself on a beach amidst the beauty of the natural world, or with God in moments of meditation, but here I want to try an expand the sense of intimacy that is available between people without reference to the duration of a relationship.

To feel connected and in contact deeply with nature or God or another person is high in values that make any given day meaningful and good. Let us not become so focused on the future of relationship that we miss the profound satisfaction of encounters profound not in their length but in their depth.

"It" Happens

I've got this thing about toilet paper. When the supply dwindles to four rolls in my house, I become nervous.

This unusual obsession began a couple of years ago when my husband of sixteen years decided he didn't want the responsibility of a wife and kids, was in love with someone else, and needed to find himself (his words). Surprised the hell out of me, I didn't know he was lost. My comment to him was I hoped IT festers and falls off.

"You handle everything," Dickless orders. "Just let me know what to sign. By the way, how soon can you and kids leave?" What a guy!

So there I was with the whole responsibility ball-of-wax dumped in my lap. Okay, fine, I can deal with this—after all, I'm a Mother.

I write up a lengthy separation agreement. Tucked neatly in my list of "bribes for allowing his freedom," are alimony and child support arrangements, I get the kids, he gets the dog-fish-cat-and fiddler crab, small details like that. No problem, I'm an efficient mother.

Numb-nuts decides he doesn't need a lawyer, we're adults. Simple. I just include a statement he waives his right to an attorney. Then I insist the two of us and a notary initial each and every page of the document; this isn't a good time to take chances, I decide—I'm an efficient and smart mother.

Divorce filing time rolls around. Just to make sure everything goes without a hitch I get a lawyer. Looking over my little home-made separation agreement, my attorney's eyebrows twitch and proverbial jaw drops, "He actually signed this?"

"Yes, ma'am," I nod, nonchalantly checking out my manicure. "You play, you play—and he will."

"Will you write my settlement agreement?" the lawyer begs. God, I'm good.

So here I am—divorced, two kids, and all the responsibility. Too easy for him and too much for me is what I think sometimes. Oh, well...

Now, despite what you may think, I'm not exactly rolling in greenbacks. The phone company wishes I'd revert to two tin cans and a string. The finance company is forever wanting their car back. My kids have decided they hate rice—bulk sale buy, naturally.

The way I look at these annoyances is simple. I've been stood up by the best: my husband, Joey Windisch in seventh grade, the utility companies, Publishers Clearinghouse Sweepstakes; but I'm still here kicking.

You're probably wondering what I'm doing with my time now. Finding myself, what else? And I hope I get there before he does. I've gone back to college, of course—what any self-respecting degree-less woman would do. I need that piece of paper to prove I'm an efficient smart mother, and damn good at it.

The moral of the story: when life gives me shit it's my responsibility to stockpile toilet paper.

Letters to The Editor

Dear Editor,

The purpose of this letter is to address an issue brought up in the lead editorial in the September 16th issue. The issue was the madness that we allow to continue on the streets of this country. While I agree that it is time to stop the madness, I find that the writers analysis and proposed solutions are fundamentally flawed. The writer feels that we must do something about the "gun problem" in this country, but offers a solution that only addresses a symptom and not the cause itself. The problem with guns in this country is not the guns themselves but the behavior associated with them. Until we attempt to modify the behavior, the problem (i.e. the "madness") will continue. Whether law abiding citizens are allowed access to guns or not.

The solution proposed by the writer is to re-interpret (or misinterpret) the Second Amendment, seeing as how times have changed. The proposal is to limit the gun ownership of law abiding individuals only to guns that were available at the time of the writing of the Constitution. This solution is based on three mistaken assumptions about the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and the individuals who wrote it. The first is that there is a need for interpretation of the documents. The authors were very clear in their intent, one only needs to read their writings by these same individuals to understand this, and they were very careful to put down their ideas in a plain language that left no room for "interpretation." The writer also believes that the purpose for the Second Amendment was to ensure that states a militia for the defense of the country. This is only part of it. The other two reasons are expressly for defense of person and property, and to see to it that none of the other nine are tampered with. Third, at the time of the writing of the Constitution, a militia consisted of every able bodied adult male, and they were required to keep, maintain and remain proficient with an appropriate firearm. If one were to extend that meaning to today, every able bodied adult (male or female) would be required to maintain at home the equipment issued to the average soldier (i.e. fully automatic weapons, a few grenades etc.). The only modern example of a militia that I'm aware of is that of Switzerland where the above conditions exist. (The writer might want to examine the crime rate statistics for that country). While the comparison of this country with Switzerland is not really valid because conditions in both are different, the same can be said about comparisons made with countries that have strict gun control.

The writer of the editorial also admonished us to remember the founding fathers incorporated a means of changing the Constitution when the new arose (Article V). This is true. So for all those who wish to eliminate gun ownership for the law abiding and reserve it for the Government (and criminals), let them do so by constitutional means and not by executive order or congressional subversion of the Constitution.

I'm also a little curious about whether the writer interprets the rest of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights as loosely as he (she) does the Second Amendment. In light of the proposal offered, would the writer see to it that the right to free speech be limited only to the print media, as there were no television, radio, computer or other networks in existence at the time of the writing of the Constitution. I can't help but think that the writer would enjoy seeing the newspaper once again become the prime influence in American thought.

It is clear, though, that in every other Amendment where the "people" are referred to either collectively or individually, the rights expressed extend to the individual. I'm sure and would be willing to wager my own revolver (which I "keep" and pray I never have to "bare" in defense) that the writer also believes this. As a point of reference, I am a member of the National Rifle Association having joined only recently because of the alarming increase in activity by many of the gun control groups and the flippant regard with which they seem to hold the Constitution.

To return to the problem in question, the individuals responsible for this so called "madness" are not innocents caught up in the passion of the moment and, finding a gun in their hands, committing these acts. They are, in simple terms, nothing more than predators, and whether they have in their hands a gun, a knife, a chain, a baseball bat, a crowbar, or any other implement that can be used to kill, they will remain predators until convinced otherwise. Again, the problem is most definitely not the Second Amendment nor the guns themselves. Until we are ready to invoke and maintain large disincentives to committing violent behavior, we will always be burdened with it.

Andrew Malinowycz, senior
UNCW

Dear Editor,

It was so refreshing to hear the rhetoric you so eloquently penned in your September 16 Editorial "Who Will Stop the Madness?" It is just another reminder to me and the other people who read and listen to the liberal media that the criminals of our country are the ones who are made out to be the good guys.

As you have stated, the "times have changed and people can no longer be trusted to use firearms in the defense of the country (the original intention of the amendment)." I'm sorry, I did not realize that I was speaking to someone who was actually right next to the writers of the Constitution. Of course the Constitution is open for debate, but how can you say what anyone else mean? If you actually believe the 2nd Amendment was only meant for the musket and flint-lock rifle, then what keeps me from saying that the 1st Amendment only protects papers printed with a hand press and you can throw TV and radio out of the whole picture?

It is time for us to actually address the issue of why this nation has slowly progressed to where it has come today. It might be that we do not spend enough money for education, there is too much poverty, or whatever reasons you can think up; but let us not forget that what we sometimes believe is a product of society is simply a menace to society. Criminals are criminal and deserve to be treated as such, not as the victims that they so grievously affected. Why don't we come up with real answers to the problem with gun violence. The NRA supports an electronic background check when people purchase guns, they also support stiffer penalties for crimes involving illegally purchased or stolen weapons. But these would be much to easy to enforce, right?

If our country would only enforce the laws that they have on the books now, then we could possibly see that the law would once again be respected as it should be. Criminals commit crimes because they know they can get away with it and even if they are caught, they know that the corrections system is so overcrowded, they might spend a quarter of their sentence in jail. America needs to wake up and see that the real problem is that we are naive and apt to believe that we can blame a piece of steel for all of our problems.

I remember a few years back when a group of young Chinese students decided to protest their government in a land far from our own. It ended up being a blood bath with the casualties extremely heavy on the student side. What did we do as Americans? We sat and watched with amazement and nothing else. There they were, all the students running for their lives because they could not do anything else. But look at their government. They do not allow their citizens to own firearms and I'm sure they are all extremely happy citizens.

I stand to protect the Constitution just as the rest of America does, and I even stand to protect the 1st Amendment for people such as yourself, but why can't we help our nation without creating a farce out of our Constitution? Let us address the issues of today in a manner that will help our country and not destroy it.

Patrick Kay, UNCW student

Support UNCW By Supporting The Bond Referendum

On Nov. 2 we will have the opportunity to vote on a bond package which includes $310 million dollars for university improvements within the UNC system. If that component of the bond is won, UNCW will receive $19,514,950 which will be used to build a new science building, renovate DeLoach Hall, and add a new wing to Bear Hall. These additions are desperately needed.

In 1991, UNCW had the most crowded academic facilities in the entire UNC system. Since the fall of 1988, our student body has increased 25 percent with no increase in square footage for academic facilities. This shortage of space has weighed heavily on laboratory sciences. UNCW laboratories are more fully utilized than labs at any other UNC school. Labs in DeLoach Hall contain work stations designed for two students. It is common for four or more students to work at these two-person stations. Friday Hall, which houses the Departments of Biological Sciences, Earth Sciences, and Environmental Sciences, was built in 1974 when the student body numbered 2,850. Today there are over 8,000 students at UNCW. Of these 8,000 students, approximately 1,150 are biology majors, compared to 477 biology majors when Friday was built.

There are also 49 graduate students. Biological sciences, chemistry, and earth sciences are essential components of our internationally ranked marine sciences program, which has been unable to grow in faculty, graduate, and undergraduate students because of space limitations.

As students and responsible citizens, it is your duty to vote on Nov. 2 for the bond that will allow these conditions to be improved. A new science building is already planned for the northwest corner of Reynolds Dr. and Chancellor's Walk, near Cameron Hall. The 100,000 square-foot building will contain classrooms, laboratories, faculty offices, and an auditorium. Occupation of the building is anticipated for the 1996 academic year.

Bear Hall's 11,547 square-foot addition will be built on the west side of the building. It will be the same as the east wing, which was added in 1989. It is expected to be ready in two years.

There is no reason not to vote in favor of the bond. Interest rates are low, making this an ideal time to borrow. According to the U.S. Bureau of the Census, North Carolina's net long-term debt per capita is $134 as compared to a national state average of $506 and a Southeastern state average of $391.

State Treasurer Harlan Boyles says, "North Carolina, with its very low debt currently, has the borrowing capacity to take on the proposed new debt in the Nov. 2 bond referendums. Because the debt service on those bonds will be a tiny percentage of the overall state budget, state taxes should not have to be raised to meet payments of interest and principle." He also says that if North Carolina does not address capital construction backlog, the state's excellent bond rating will be jeopardized.

Approval of the bond will stimulate North Carolina's economy by creating jobs. UNCW economist, Dr. W.W. Hall estimates that UNCW's share will have an economic impact of $41.1 million during the construction period. These construction projects will generate an average of 230 jobs per year and $13.2 million in payroll over the life of the project for New Hanover, Brunswick, Pender, and Columbus counties.

If you are not registered to vote, you have until Oct. 11 to get registered. If you are registered in another county in the state, vote by absentee ballot. Two events will be held on campus at which students can register. The first is an event to build the longest banana split in UNCW history. It takes place Thursday, Sept. 30 at 1 p.m. in the University Center Ballroom. The cost is $1.00 per student. The other event is a power lifting competition which takes place Sept. 30 at 2 p.m. There is a $2.00 participation fee. The purpose of these events is to raise money to help get students registered to vote. Since it is illegal to use state funds for this purpose, President of the UNC system, C. D. Spangler, requested that each of the universities raise $1.00 per student to help cover the costs of registering voters.

Do your part by registering and voting for the bond. The total bond is $740 million and it contains four components, university improvements being one. Each of the components will be voted on separately. Even if you don't vote for the other three components, vote for improved educational facilities. It's long overdue and desperately needed!

Second...and Last... Annual Full Tilt 1993

Hugh MacRae Park was the happening place to be on Saturday, September 11, 1993. Kappa Alpha and Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternities hosted some 1,600 people in attendance. Tickets were five dollars in advance and seven dollars at the gate.

This day was welcomed by the many cooler totting students coming to hear the progressive sounds of the bands. Listening to the grunge sounds of Fluid Grind, followed by the progressive Cravin' Melons, and of course, Dillon Fence, playing their college groove. The music jammed from noon until about six that evening. The day went on without any problems. Both Fraternities offered free rides home to anyone who needed them, reinforcing their stand against drunk driving.

However, parties in the park may no longer occur. UNCW wants to put an end to "Open Parties." William Bryan, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, wants to make all the Greek organizations on campus comply with Risk Management. Risk Management was put into effect on August 1 of this year and was created in order for the Greeks to govern themselves. One of the requirements for insurance coverage is that each Greek organization has a comprehensive Risk Management plan. By adapting a Risk Management plan, each individual fraternity will make the Greek environment safe for their members and guests. Vice Chancellor Bryan has been trying to be supportive of the Greeks, but is concerned that some organizations are not complying. Bryan says, "holding Greeks to higher standards will make them better organizations." He feels there are no controls at open parties and this is the main cause for problems. Bryan does add however, that "Greek organizations have made some real efforts to comply with Risk Management," and to help them become more creative, "we want to work with them any way we can."

Bob Smith, Assistant Dean of Students, says "there has been a great reluctance on the part of local chapters to adhere to their own national policies, and also a great reluctance on the part of IFC to establish a mechanism to govern itself in Risk Management." Smith believes strongly in the fraternities and wants them "to be creative in learning to live with Risk Management." He also thinks they should be able to comply. Bob says "it's common sense, just adhere to your own national policies."

On the other hand, Greeks do not feel the same way as UNCW does. Some feel that what was designed to help, and steer them in the right direction is now being used against them. James Nicholas, President of Kappa Alpha Order says, "In the past year, the Greeks have gained a lot of ground in their effort to comply with the requirements of Risk Management. Greeks have become better educated and more self aware of Risk Management policies." Greeks think their needs to be an attempt at better communication between Greeks and school in order to come to a middle ground of understanding.

Risk Management is a newly introduced policy that the Greeks must familiarize themselves with, so they can fully comply with all the guidelines. This process will take time, and in order to satisfy all involved interests, communication between the Greeks and the University must be clear.

Quote of the week: "Hey, there's the aerobics guy! And look, he's drinking a beer!!"

Monday Night Malaria

Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

You know what I miss? I miss Hank Williams Jr.'s intro to Monday Night Football. What's more rough and tumble and dirty than football? What singer is more rough and dirty than Bocephus? When Hank sang about football, you got the feeling a lot of eatin' and drinkin' and spittin' and cussin' friends were coming over to trash the place. That's the way it ought to be. Monday Night Football should leave the place a wreck.

Free food. Things to stuff your face with. That's what's important, and cheap beer. Both of these requirements can be filled at Chl Chl's on Monday night. They offer free nachos and dip as well as free buffalo wings.

Three hot-dogs for $1.00 and three tacos for $1.00 can also be found. Giveaways at half-time. I never win.

The Holiday Inn at Wrightsville Beach offers a video football tournament before the game. They offer $0.75 draft and usually some form of free appetizers. They used to have trivia contests. I did actually win once here.

Rock Ola Cafe offers specials on Sunday and Monday nights. You can get any appetizer for $2.50 and drink the coldest draft in town for $0.99. If your bartender is Tanner, make him do a trick for you. Tell him you read about it in the funny papers.

And then there is Hooters. How could you be a red-blooded American male and not like Hooters? I love Hooters (me and Al Bundy). Hooters offers free wings and giveaways at half-time. $1.00 beer is the price you will pay for the scenery and the headache the next day if you have too much of a good thing.

If you really want to be adventurous, try hitting all these places in one Monday night. I suggest a sober driver and make sure you don't really care about the game, like when Dallas is playing anybody or when Tampa Bay is playing New England. Who cares?

Finally, in this rambling piece of pseudo-journalism, let me say a word or two about drinking heavily on Monday nights. It is all right to enjoy the game. It is not OK to puke inside any of these places. Please make your way outside if you need to hurl. There is nothing more of a downer than cheering for your favorite team when, all of a sudden, someone ralphs on your shoes. Please, take it outside.

That is it for this week. I'm on my way out the door, hands raised in a triumph and singing a victory song.

From The Pixies to The Breeders

Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

The alternative music scene suffered a huge loss this past year when, following their chaotic tour opening for U2, The Pixies broke up. That's the bad news. The good news is that from the ashes rose two new bands or solo projects. I prefer to call them bands. The first one, the Breeders, have actually been around for a while. Formed about three years ago by ex-Pixies bassist and co-vocalist Kim Deal, the Breeders released an album, "Pod" and an EP, "Safari."

Tanya Donnelly, of Throwing Muses and Belly fame was in the group at the time. "Pod" featured stripped-down production and catchy tunes such as "Fortunately Gone," while "Safari" featured slower, more feedback-driven songs. The brand spankin' new Breeders' album, entitled "Last Splash" continues the progression away from pop songs and more towards Sonic Youth-style noise blasts.

The opening track, "New Year" features heavy guitar remarkable similar to Black Sabbath's classic "Paranoid." Then comes the highlight of the album, "Cannonball," which is easily one of the best songs of the year and is currently receiving a pretty good amount of MTV play. There is also a slower, sleeper version of "Do You Love Me Now," which first appeared on the "Safari" EP. This album takes a few listens to get used to, especially the loud tracks in the middle.

The next to last song, "Drivin' On" is a notable exception in that it is a lovable idiotic country song. Yes, you heard me right—a country song. Kim Deal's dreamy signs pull it off, however, and gives the album some much needed diversity.

Over the summer, ex-Pixies front man Black Francis changed his name to Frank Black and released a solo album simply entitled, "Frank Black." I tend to dislike most solo albums, so I was a little apprehensive about this one at first. But then I popped it into my CD player and was immediately astounded by "Los Angeles," a hard-rockin' anthem that was featured in the film Lethal Weapon 3.

The album doesn't slack off, either. "I Heard Romona Sing" and "Every Time I go Around Here" are both beautiful acoustic numbers, while "Perry the Wind, High, Low" and "Czar" crank just as loud as anything on the Pixies' classic album, "Doo Little."

"Frank Black" actually sounds like another Pixies album; it is moody, experimental, and highly unpredictable. Frank Black's vocals change from song to song, making the album complete listenable from start to finish. The music is great, too, particularly the guitars. Check out the hilarious Mexican farce, "Brackish Boy" and "Ten Percenter" and you'll see what I mean.

"Frank Black" resembles the Pixies slightly more than "Last Splash" does, but both albums avoid rehashing old songs and instead improving upon what we all loved about the Pixies. I highly recommend both albums, with an overall rating of an "A," and also suggest that you check out the Breeders' debut "Pod" if you haven't already. May the Pixies rest in peace.

Quest Returns

Johnny Quest is BACK!

The band will be performing at an outdoor show at Legion Field in Wilmington on Sunday, October 3. It is one of the first shows in the Wilmington area since the van accident last march, which destroyed all the bands' equipment and broke the drummer's leg in 50 places. The show should be big.

This event is a co-headline with Dillon Fence, and also on the bill are Soul Violets, Fluid Grind, and Candy Pig. Tickets are available in advance from School Kids Records, Pointeater Records, or Surf City for $10.00 (with Student ID.) and $12.00 for everyone else. Tickets will be available at the door for $15.00.

The events of the day begin at noon, with Johnny Quest scheduled to close the show, taking the stage from 7:30 PM to 9:00 PM.

Please note that in the above picture, Jack Campbell has left the band to concentrate on his two record stores in North Carolina. The new bassist is Tom Mills, formerly of the band Snapperhead.

The Psychology behind the Citibank Classic Visa card, and the emotional security of the Photocard.

The Citibank Classic Visa[®] instills in students feelings of safety, security, and general wellness not unlike those experienced in the womb. Therefore, it is the mother of all credit cards. ¶ Some experts attribute these feelings to the Citibank Photocard, the only credit card with your photo on it. A voice inside says, "This is me, really me." (As opposed to, "Who the heck is that?"—a common response to the photo on one's driver's license.) It's an immediate form of ID, a boost to your self-image. ¶ Of course if your card is ever lost or stolen and a stranger is prevented from using it, you'll feel exceptionally good (showing no signs of Credit Card Theft Nervosa). ¶ Other experts point to specific services, such as The Lost Wallet[™] Service that can replace your card usually within 24 hours. Or the 24-Hour Customer Service line, your hotline, if you will, for any card-related anxiety whatsoever. ¶ Further analysis reveals three services that protect the purchases you make on the Citibank

Subject suffering from Credit Card Theft Nervosa.

Classic Visa card, at no additional cost. 1. Buyers Security[™] can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase¹ (preventing, of course, Insecurity).

2. Citibank Lifetime Warranty[™] allows one to extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.² 3. And Citibank Price Protection assures you of the best price. You need only see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150³ (hence no Post Purchase Depression). ¶ Special student savings are particularly therapeutic. There's the free Citibank Calling Service[™] from MCI to save up to 26% on long distance calls versus AT&T.³ (You're encouraged to call Mom and Dad regularly preventing Parenta Non-Supportus.) And a $20 Airfare Discount⁴ on any domestic flight.

(Case studies indicate that a Fear of Flying is overcome when Spring Break in sunny Florida is a possibility.) Not to mention the low variable interest rate of 15.4%⁵ and no annual fee for college students. ¶ Suffice it to say, you'll have a credit card you can depend on while building a credit history. So call 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19, to apply over the phone (students don't need a job or a cosigner) or to have your photo added to your Citibank Classic Visa card. ¶ If we say that a sense of Identity is the first component of the Citibank Classic Visa card, a sense of Security the second, and a sense of Autonomous Will from your newfound financial independence the third, don't be crazy...Call.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Cultivate Writing at the Writing PlaceBY JOHN BRYAN
Staff Writer

A greenhouse in Morton Hall? Yes, but you won't want to bring in your plants to cultivate them there; bring yourself and your writing instead, because The Writing Place is a greenhouse for writers. It is where you go to cultivate your writing.

A student, upon entering The Writing Place, will immediately sense the warm, fertile atmosphere that pervades there. The writing consultants, made up largely of students, are the main force behind this feeling. Writing consultant and student Diane Hopcraft is an example.

"We're here to listen to what the writer has to say," she says, "...through listening and talking through the concerns the writer has with his or her writing, we allow the writer to improve his or her writing."

Dr. Thomas MacLennan, Director of The Writing Place, says in his policy statement, "There are several principles that underlie our work with students...most of them are embodied in the Socratic ethos of raising questions and engaging students in conversation. We want students who come to The Writing Place to discover truths through their own processes."

Students who use the services of The Writing Place almost always come away with a feeling of accomplishment and growth with regard to their writing, according to Hopcraft. To get the best results from a visit to The Writing Place, she suggests having a draft already written before coming in. Of course, if writer's block happens to be the problem, you can come in without a draft. She also suggests that writers come in well before the day the assignment is due. "Sometimes, writers will come in for help two or three hours before the assignment is due. There's not much we can do at that point," Diane believes that it is "important to view writing as a process," a belief that is also held by the other consultants.

The Writing Place has computers that students can use for their word processing needs. Students interested in visiting The Writing Place for writing consultations or word processing are encouraged to make an appointment by stopping by or calling 395-3549 to arrange a time. The Writing Place is open Monday through Thursday 10 a.m.-9 p.m., Friday 10 a.m.-3 p.m., and Sunday 4 - 9 p.m.. Students without an appointment may also visit on a space available basis.

THIS WEEK IN SPORTS

Golf BY ERIK TOTTON Sports Editor

The Men's Seahawk golf team made their season debut last week at the Tom O'Brian Memorial Tournament. The Seahawks matched last years performance with another second place finish at the Cardinal Golf Course in Greensboro, NC. "I was pleased, they played very well. The team was capable of winning but they just ran into a few problems," Coach Lane stated. The Seahawks were led by two newcomers to the UNCW golf program as Brian Spence shot at 217 and Steve Doucet fixed a 218. Individual results for UNCW were Lee Watson -226, Gregg Cuthill -224, Steve Doucet -218, Michael Cato -223, J.D. Mann -224 and Brian Spencer -217. The Seahawks men will compete again in two weeks at the Hargrove B. Davis Memorial Tournament at Campbell University's Keith Hills Golf Club.

The UNCW Women's Golf Team was also in action last week at Florida State's Lady Seminole Invitational. The Seahawks finished 13th out of 15 teams. Gwen Gravina -243, and Marci Moore -250, led the way for the Seahawks. Also competing for the Seahawks were Lin Valera -251, Stephanie Pulin -252 and Tina Lynch -263.

Runners Enjoying Success

BY KATIE ALLEN Sports Writer

The UNCW Cross Country Team, coached by Jim Sprecher, is enjoying a very successful year on both the Men's and Women's side. While it is still early in the season, it is obvious that the best is yet to come.

For the men, Tim Cox and Jeff Tiegs are the primary runners. "We have a lot of experience back this season, and the team should be really competitive," said Coach Sprecher.

On the Women's side, Heather Finton and Tracy Webb are the stand outs. "We are lacking in experience. There is only one junior and the rest of our runners are freshmen and sophomores," stated Coach Sprecher. "The women are building experiences, and they should be prepared for the bigger meets towards the end of the season."

Both teams were inactive this week. They will resume competition this weekend at the Georgetown Invitational in Washington D.C. "There will be five out of the top 25 schools in our conference competing," said Coach Sprecher. "This will give us the opportunity to scout out our competition for later in the season."

The Cross-Country team has great aspirations for the remainder of the season. It is hopeful that they will strengthen over the course of the next few weeks. If they do so, it is likely that they will be successful at their final meet, the NCAA districts on November 13

BY JOELLE KIBLER Sports Writer

Danny Cash originally from Durham, North Carolina is a senior this year on the Men's Cross Country Team. He will graduate this coming December with a degree in History and a minor in Geography.

Danny started his track career as a sophomore in high school then focused more toward cross-country in his junior year. In 1989 when UNCW started a Track and Field program, Danny decided to tryout for the team as a walk-on. Even if he didn't make the team his freshman year, Danny still would of chose to attend UNCW because "the campus is awesome." Also because of worked harder to tryout the following year.

A meet in cross-country consists of a single race. The top seven runners on the team compete on a 8000 m (5 mile) course that is determined by each individual college or university. The top five of these seven runners get a point value in accordance to the number in which they cross the finish line; the team with the lowest score wins. Cross-country is a team sport where you expect a lot from the team, and problems start to develop when it becomes individualized.

Danny has high expectations and hopes for his team this year to place within the conference. "If everyone can come together, we have an outside shot of the conference, all seven runners have to win that day," Danny notes. The NCAA districts run a 10,000 m (6.2 mile) race. The entire Cross-country season prepares for the single all-conference meet. Danny's personal goal for his final season is to finish among the top twelve runners in the all-conference meet.

Danny would like to see more recognition and stress on the cross-country program within the university. He would like to see Cross-country as it's own individual sport instead of being seen as a preparation for Track and Field. "The team needs name recognition to build the mentality that will cause better team backing," Danny states. He sees the student and faculty support as "dead". If we are lucky we have some parents show up. Granted we don't do that much, but more people show up for the high school meets then they do ours," Danny adds. He just can't understand where the support is since other colleges have a high spectator attendance.

Cross-country has made Danny a much stronger person and more goal-oriented. It takes a lot of hard work physically and mentally to participate. "You can't just start playing and be good. You have to be willing to train with a lot of perseverance," Danny comments. Cross-country athletes put in at least seventy miles a week (8-10 miles a day) running, incorporated with strength training which can put a fair amount of strain on some individuals.

Danny's future plans definitely include running. He will continue to do some road races and will begin preparing for the Olympic trials in the marathon after graduation. "my goals for the next few years is to try and make the trials and possibly go to the 1996 Olympics," Danny remarks. But presently Danny is preparing for family life with his wife, Debra, and hopes to land a job in a public history program at a Parks Service or Historian Site.

Family and friends have been a beneficial support system for Danny throughout his career. His former high school coach, Charles Payne, will become his post-collegiate coach. "Coach Payne has always been there for me anytime I have a problem. He is a friend as well as a coach, he is my mentor," Danny notes. Fellow teammates, Tim Cox and Jeff Tiegs, have also contributed to Danny's determination. "They both have the mentality to keep you strong which makes you run better, and they have the will to get better to do what you have to do," Danny states. His wife and mother also support his hard-work and talent in running.

The Deciding Vote: The Bond Issue

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

This election year it is especially important for the students and faculty in the UNC school system to exercise their right to vote. The North Carolina General Assembly has passed legislation enabling the citizens of North Carolina to vote Nov. 2, on a $74 million bond issue.

If you ever wondered why you cannot get all of your classes at registration, it is because of the lack of classroom space. In 1991, UNCW ranked first in having the most crowded academic facilities in the UNC system. Since the fall of 1988, UNCW's student body increased 25 percent, with no increase in square footage for academic facilities. For example, Friday Hall was built in 1974, when the student body was only 2,850. Biological sciences, chemistry, and earth sciences are essential to UNCW's marine sciences programs. The current student body is 8,050, and the numbers of marine science majors have leaped from 477 in 1974, to 1,155 in 1992. Therefore, it is necessary to provide more classroom and laboratory space.

"Typically, lab rooms are designed to be used for about 20 hours a week. Ours are used approximately 48 hours a week," says Dr. Ned Martin of the Chemistry Department in DeLoach Hall. Students have had to work in pairs due to lack of space. DeLoach was built in 1968 for a university with only 2,000 students. "Although DeLoach has served the university well, changes in its use have made it outdated," says Martin. For instance, fume hoods which are used to remove contaminated air, were originally used only occasionally. Today, fume hoods operate at least 12 hours a day. Class time ranges from 8 a.m. to 9:20 p.m. because of a lack of available space for class and labs during the day. DeLoach's heating, ventilating, and air conditioning systems (HVAC) cannot provide enough dehumidified air to make up for the contaminated air that is put out by the fume hoods. The result is that hot humid air gets sucked in from outside. "Hot humid air caused corrosion of instruments and the swelling of wooden drawers. Many of the drawers are unable to be opened. Things shouldn't corrode in an air conditioned building," says Martin. The bond issue will provide funds to renovate DeLoach Hall, as well as construct a new science building.

Dr. Martin served as the liaison between the chemistry department and architects to help design a building that would meet the needs of the department. "We have come up with a building that will be efficient and safe, and will meet all of the ventilation codes. It will have a lot of features that do not exist now because of age and lack of space," says Martin.

The new 100,000 square-foot science building is expected to house classrooms, a quantitative lab, eleven research labs, two organic chemistry labs, three introductory chemistry labs, faculty offices, and an auditorium. The new building will be placed on the northwest corner of Reynolds Drive and Chancellor's Walk, near Cameron Hall. The initial planning of the building was completed in 1991. Planning and construction are expected to take approximately 36 months, with occupation of the building in the 1996 academic year. The cost of the building is $18,522,900.

Along with a new science building, and renovation to DeLoach Hall, the bond issue will provide $992,050 for a new wing on Bear Hall. The 11,547 square-foot addition will be built on the west side of the building, and will mirror the east wing, which was added in 1989. The new west wing will include faculty offices, an 80 student classroom, and two smaller classrooms. It is expected to be ready for occupancy after 24 months of design and construction.

It is obvious that space is at a premium for science laboratories, faculty offices, classrooms, and work areas for graduate students. Therefore, it is crucial for students and faculty to be registered to vote by October 11, 1993, so they can vote on the bond issue on November 2, 1993. "There will be registrars on hand from the League of Women's Voters in the University Center Ballroom on September 30, 1993 during the Banana Split Building Event, and the Powerlift Competition," says Mimi Cunningham, Executive Director of University Relations. Voting for the bond issue may be one of the most important things a student or faculty member could do for UNCW. "If everyone voted, that would be fantastic," Cunningham said.

If you would like further information about the bond issue, WECT-TV 6 will air "Building North Carolina Bonds for Higher Education" on Oct. 31, at 5:30 p.m. The show will air a discussion about the bond issue. Participants will be from Pembroke State University, UNC Wilmington, Fayetteville State University, Southeastern Community College, Bladen Community College, and Brunswick Community College on the bond issue.

State Treasurer Harlan Boyles says taxes will not increase if the bond passes. Boyles projects that the state tax base will expand sufficiently to cover the repayment of principal and interest.

Michael Howe Memorial Service

BY ERICA BRANDON
Staff Writer

A memorial service will be held for Michael Allen Howe on the lawn of Friday Hall on Friday, Oct. 1, at 5 p.m. The service will be informal and will be conducted by his friends, who include Chris Baldwin and Matt McIver. Anyone who attends the service will be invited to speak about their memories of Howe if they wish. During the service, a Golden Rain tree will be planted in front of Friday Hall in his memory. A plaque will be dedicated to Howe later in the year.

Michael Howe was killed on July 14, 1993, in Panama during a rock climbing accident while vacationing with friends.

Howe was a junior here at UNCW. He served as president of the Biology Club for two years. He was very active in the Biology community. The 1993-94 Biology Club president, Heather Woodson, remembered him as "good at inspiring other people." She also remembered him as always being happy and being a hard worker who always managed to make good grades.

Global Volunteers Are in The Business of Helping

BY ELLEN E. EZZELL
Staff Writer

There are many volunteer organizations here at UNCW, all of which offer their services to needy families. However, only one specializes in the geographical variety that the UNCW Global Volunteers provides. The UNCW Global Volunteers is a student organization which plans and carries out a service-learning trip to a needy area each year. The first trip, held in 1990, was to Pueblo, Mexico. The group stayed with families and helped repair a local school. In 1991, Global Volunteers provided labor in the Appalachian Mountains of Virginia. Last year they went to the tropics of Barbados, where the students helped renovate an orphanage.

The week-long trips are spent doing hard labor. Several days are usually allotted for sightseeing, during which the group learns more about the area they are visiting.

The planning for the trip this year has already begun. With as many as forty people showing interest, the group has planned a trip to Jamaica. Only about fifteen students will be selected to actually attend the trip, but the other members will provide vital support. All members help raise money through donations and fundraisers. The Volunteers sponsor a booth at The Azalea Festival, host car washes, and sell donuts. Major support is provided by the Student Government Association, the Chancellor's Office and private donations.

This year a bonus trip may be sponsored during spring break. Plans are underway for a trip to Miami, Florida, where the students would help with the rebuilding of homes and businesses damaged by Hurricane Andrew. The group is headed by Rev. Bob Haywood, Protestant Campus Minister, and is sponsored in coordination with The Leadership Center and United Campus Christian Ministries at UNCW.

Haywood feels that students can get much out of the volunteer network. "It is a chance for students to learn about themselves by learning to balance the needs of the group with their personal needs."

The organization basically began as an opportunity for local students to expand their knowledge of society. "It was created for students who don't have a lot of experience with diversity in their own culture. It gives students an opportunity to interact with a totally different culture, benefiting the students directly," said Haywood.

The reward that comes from helping the needy is unforgettable. Coordinator Lisa Snyder, feels that the enrichment she gained from last year's trip will stay with her forever. "The trip last year was a great learning experience. We met and interacted with other cultures. It was the best experience of my life and definitely one that I will always remember."

Interested students should contact Bob Haywood at 799-8497. Space is limited to the truly interested and devoted.

UNCW Theatre Presents

BY MELANIE HURLEY
Staff Writer

The UNCW University Theatre will present three plays this year. Ely Wright: The Story of Two Brothers by UNCW Professor Frank Trimble, will be presented at 8 p.m., Oct. 15-18 in Thalian Hall. The Verge by Susan Glaspell will be presented in February, and Rockless by Craig Lucas will be presented in April.

Ely Wright is a two act opera that tells the story of Willbur and Orville Wright using pop, rock, jazz, blues, gospel, and country music. The play presents both the comic and tragic times in the Wright brothers' lives.

Ely Wright, Trimble's first play, was written over a two-year period. Trimble completed it in October 1992. It was first performed last December by the Thalian Association. Trimble said this year's performance will give him an opportunity to make some changes in the music, as well as a chance to work with new people.

Trimble said that musicals are not usually performed at UNCW during the regular season. They are usually performed in the summer. He said it is nice that students who enjoy doing musicals have an opportunity to perform one during the regular season.

In addition to performances at UNCW, Ely Wright will be presented at The North Carolina American College Theatre Festival competition in November.

The UNCW Theatre curriculum provides a variety of classes for theatre students and includes concentration in a specific area of theatre study. Participation in performances is required so that students can improve their skills in performance, design and technical, and management responsibilities. Funds for University Theatre productions come from university allocations and student fees. UNCW students may attend performances free of charge with a student id.

Schweitzer Lecture Begins

Dr. Oscar Arias, former president of Costa Rica and the 1987 winner of the Nobel Prize for Peace, will speak at 4 p.m., Oct. 4, in Kenan Auditorium. He is expected to discuss the struggle for peace. His talk, the first in the Albert Schweitzer Lecture Series is free and open to the public.

Arias served as president of Costa Rica from 1986 to 1990. During his presidency, he was the main author of the central American Peace plan, for which he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace. Also a recipient of the Philadelphia Liberty Medal, he currently heads the Arias Foundation for Peace and Human Progress.

Prior to his term as president, Arias was a professor of political science at the University of Costa Rica, served as Costa Rica's minister of planning, and as general secretary of the country's national liberation party. Educated at Costa Rica and at Brown University, Arias received his doctorate degree from the University of Essex in Great Britain.

The Albert Schweitzer International Prizes are awarded every four years at UNCW in the areas of medicine, music, and the humanities. The prizes are sponsored by the North Carolina Educational, Historical, and Scientific Foundation Inc. and are granted to those who reflect Schweitzer's "reverence for life."

UNCW Tackles Sexual Assault

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

More volunteers are needed to help heighten awareness.

As the problem of sexual assault gains more prominence in the country's eyes as a social problem, the methods of getting the message out is taking on increased importance. The problem is not with the numbers, they are alarming enough. It's getting women to realize they could be victimized at anytime.

In a report released by the National Victim Center in 1992, an estimated 12.1 million women in the United States had been the victim of forcible rape. The latest figures also point out an estimated 683,000 forcible rapes occur each year in the United States. That breaks down to 1,871 per hour, 78 per hour, or 1.3 a minute.

On the campus of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington (UNCW), Reach Out! has been formed to increase student awareness about sexual violence and actively involve students in developing communication skills in relationships. Since the majority of rapes are acquaintance or date rapes, the program is going to provide a dramatic demonstration in October, will be holding another "Take Back the Night" march in the spring, and is available to anyone seeking information or assistance.

Peggy Thompson and Pax Sprance are the two peer educators in the Reach Out! program, under the direction of Diane Edwards. There are also 12 volunteers who help with the program's activities. Their goal is to heighten awareness of sexual assault through education programs, advertising, brochures, whistles, pencils and posters providing information about the services available, phone numbers, and addresses.

Among the programs in the plans for Reach Out! is a "Speakin' Greek" session. "Speakin' Greek" is a series of classes that deal with Fraternity and Sorority issues sponsored by Alternatives; Rape Aggression Defense (RAD), a self-defense class involving the UNCW University Police; a UNCW-based Men Acting for Change, a men's organization that will help distribute information and offer classes that deal with the issue from a male perspective.

In October, Reach Out! is sponsoring a "Speakin' Greek" seminar that will be led by peer educators from Duke University that will divide men and women into separate groups and have the men discuss the issue with other men and women with women.

Reshaping The Middle East

WASHINGTON—At the beginning of last week, Jesse Jackson was predicting that historic peace accord between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization would open the way for improved relations between a whole variety of erstwhile dupants: Arabs and Israelis, Israelis and black South Africans, African Americans and American Jews.

By week's end, Jackson and other black leaders were scrambling to control the consequences of a domestic peace accord that took them by surprise: the widely reported rapprochement between the black leadership mainstream and the Nation of Islam.

It isn't that they don't want better relations with Minister Louis Farrakhan, leader of the group known as the Black Muslims. They do. Their nervousness is over the fact that this tentative peace, unlike the Israel/PLO accord, is not the result of careful negotiation, tactical concession, and mutually altered priorities. This one fell out of the sky during a Thursday afternoon Congressional Black Caucus forum on race in America.

Participants in the forum included Jackson, Farrakhan, Reps. Kweisi Mfume and Maxine Waters and Ben Chavis, head of the NAACP. Much of the afternoon featured attempts by the panelists to promote their particular takes on the problem of black people in America. The exchanges were, from time to time, somewhat pointed, but the theme was unity without the necessity of uniformity.

Then Chavis, the new head of the NAACP, broached a subject that the others had studiously avoided: the exclusion of Farrakhan from the recent 30th anniversary celebration of the March on Washington and Farrakhan's subsequent blast, in the Nation of Islam's newspaper, Final Call, charging the march's leadership with knuckling under to outside forces.

"It was a mistake not to have Minister Farrakhan speak at the march on Washington," said Chavis, clearly entranced by the calls for unity. "Somebody needs to have the courage to say that. It was also a mistake, Minister Farrakhan, for your publication to denounce brothers who did not present you to speak. But I would like to discuss that with you in private, because I love you and respect you."

The audience loved it. They loved it even more when Farrakhan, thanking Chavis for this statement, offered a definitional clarification.

"A mistake," he chided, "is an unintentional departure from right. An error is an intentional departure from that which is correct. It was more than a mistake. It was an error. I've never (before) used my words, my pen or my speech to attack other black leaders, but I believe it was necessary to write what I wrote. If that disturbed us to the point where we will go in the back room and iron out our differences, then black people will be all the better for my exclusion from the march on Washington and my rebuke in the Final Call.

"When we have this meeting in closed session may we iron out whatever differences we may have and make a pledge to each other that we can say in public that we will never let somebody outside of our family determine what goes on inside our family. And we will tell those who wish to exclude a member of the family from participating with the family to keep their mouth out of our family business."

It was, in fact, a stirring rhetorical moment. The problem, as black leaders acknowledged over the weekend, is that apart from differences in emphasis and approach for solving common problems, Farrakhan brings with him the baggage of anti-Semitism. He denies that he is anti-Semitic; most Jews take it as a matter of fact. And their perception has plagued both Jackson's political ambition (they wanted him to publicly distance himself from Farrakhan) and the attempts of mainstream black and Jews to repair their traditional alliance.

For Farrakhan, all this may be a sign of whimsiness among black leaders who, if they were real men and women, would refuse to "allow an enemy to both of us to get between us." For the black political/civil rights establishment, on the other hand, Jewish support is critical. Moreover, such pragmatic considerations aside, most of them simply don't subscribe to Farrakhan's notions about Jews, and they are troubled by his apparent fixation with Jews.

But they are also intrigued by the prospect of a unity that could link mainstream activists with the disaffected masses that Farrakhan can, on short notice, turn out by the thousands. Can they bring Farrakhan into the camp without triggering the defection of other critical allies?

My guess is that they can't—unless the controversial minister can get over his obsession with Jews and, like Anwar and Rabin, make the clearest and public utterance that can suspend disbelief. If he insists on going his own unreformed way, taking his occasional shot at Jews and equating black discomfiture with whimsiness, it's hard to see how last week's shining show of unity can turn out to be more than just another flash in the pan.

SGA Senator Person's Hypocrisy Is Aggravating

Last Thursday, in a meeting of the Student Media Board, Special Senator Lee Person showed an amazing amount of gall. He continually questioned money budgeted for a WLOZ trip to New York for the College Music Journal convention entitled "Music Mania."

Senator Person did not feel that money allocated to WLOZ at the beginning of the year should go toward paying for food for the students on the trip. Meanwhile, Senator Person and the rest of the Student Government Association were feeling quite relaxed and refreshed following their weekend sojourn the previous weekend to a retreat to allow the Government to get to know each other a little better and introduce the freshmen officials to the fold.

While on their retreat, which cost the student officials nothing to attend, they ate food. Who paid for the food? None of the officials had to pay any money of their pocket for the trip, so it is to be assumed that the Student Government Association picked up the bill.

While some may object to student monies being used to buy food for students on a tight budget, consider that WLOZ has only three paying positions and over 60 volunteers. Station Manager Robyn Marschall has laid plans for fund-raisers to refund WLOZ's budget by as much as 75%. One of those fund-raisers is a car wash this Saturday in the Wal-Mart shopping center.

The trip to New York for five students will cost the station $3,000, which is figured into its budget each year, and food cost is estimated at $175.

Is the Student Government Association planning any fund-raisers to repay the money it spent on a vacation, be it working or not, to become better acquainted? No.

Final numbers were not available at deadline, but Senator Person said the amount of money spent on food for the weekend was around $400. Why was Senator Person sure about the amount of money spent on food? He organized the trip for the SGA.

How can he sit and argue about spending money on food when he organized a weekend trip for the entire SGA, nearly forty students, to baiter acquaint themselves and spend more than twice as much money on food?

One can assume that Student Government Special Senator Lee Person has a long and illustrious political career ahead of him, he's all ready acting like one.

Library Vandalism and Noise Must Stop

Again this year serious students frequenting Randall Library have found that some students just don't care that the library is for study, research, and reading pleasure.

Many students have found that articles they need for research have been ripped out of the magazine. What sort of cheap skate cannot come up with a dime to make a copy? The same student who rips an article from a magazine is probably the first to complain when he can't find his article in a magazine and blame the "cheap university" for his inconvenience.

If anyone sees a student tearing apart a magazine for selfish reasons, he should notify the library staff immediately. This is an institution of higher learning for all, and that conveys a sense of responsibility. Respect the material available in the library. It is for all, not just the selfish, immature few.

Another problem rising this year (again) in the library is noise on the second floor. Not to signal them out, but sororities and fraternities seem to be the biggest noise-makers.

Though it is mandatory for the organizations to hold study sessions, they seem to be holding socials instead. The library, again, is for serious students. If you want to talk about how bad your car is or who's sleeping with whom, go somewhere else.

Assistant Dean of Students Bob Smith said that though fraternities and sororities are probably not the only offenders, they are the most obvious because of their clothing.

"As their numbers dwindle, they need to be more aware of their image," Mr. Smith said. "A serious student who may be considering joining a sorority or fraternity may get a negative image of the group and decide they are not serious."

It is up to fraternities and sororities to keep up their image. No one can create a serious argument about the negatives of joining one if they keep up a positive image and maintain a set of standards. Currently, that image and those standards are coming into question.

The library is not a social gathering spot or your personal subscription stop, respect the library or it may soon quit being a reliable resource.

Men's Basketball Team Returns the Favor, What About The Rest of UNCW?

As the UNCW Soccer team battled the N. C. State Wolfpack yesterday, the most boisterous section of the crowd belonged to the men's basketball team. The crowd, estimated at 450, was quiet except for the times early in the game when scoring chances came and the last five minutes as the Seahawks make a final thrust toward the State goal. Why?

At Truist, the noise level is incredible for the men's games from tip-off on. The main reason for that is the soccer team and international students create a European soccer stadium mentality that the home squad is the greatest group of humans to step foot on the sacred basketball floor visitors are the most rude beings on the planet and deserve to be treated as such.

This mentality should not be reserved solely for men's basketball. If there was ever an arena for obnoxious behavior, rowdiness, and all-out noise, it's a soccer field.

Though incidents like the one in Brussels during the Liverpool-Juventus match in the early '80s cannot be condoned, a fun atmosphere can be created. Cowbells, songs (Oley, oley, oley), and cheers should be part of the game of soccer. That is, after all, where it originated.

Sexual Harassment in Grammar School

WASHINGTON—Some liberal senators seeking wrongs to right have found a bountiful supply of them around playground teeter-totters, on school buses and wherever else kindergarten and grammar school children congregate and misbehave with Babylonian abandon. The senators—the usual suspects: Harkin, Simon, Moseley-Braun, Mikulski—have authored "gender equity" education bills which attack, among other "crises," that of sexual harassment among the young. The very young. Senator Kennedy, a co-sponsor of the bill says:

"You have first-, second- and third-grade harasses. You have kindergarten harasses. We're reaching out and identifying them at the earliest grades, disciplining these individuals. As with every aspect of health care, early intervention can have a big impact."

Kennedy is indispensable for illuminating the premises of contemporary liberalism. Leave aside the question of whether he is accurately depicting sexual goings-on in grammar schools. But note his use of the phrase "health care." Even if sexual harassment is as rampant as Kennedy says from kindergarten on, why call this a "health care" problem?

One answer is that health care is the hot topic in Washington, a city that has at most a one-track mind. So today people push their pet projects using the phrases "civil rights" or "children's issues," as in "A strong infrastructure is important for minorities (or children), so this highway bill is really civil rights (or children's) legislation."

But the significance of Kennedy's use of the phrase "health care" is more ideological than tactical. It expresses the mentality behind liberalism's faith in therapeutic government.

Sexual harassment, in kindergarten or anywhere, must be a health problem because all problems are health problems. Sexual harassment must be a species of pathology, a psychological defect rather than a characterological defect. Otherwise liberals will have two horrendous dilemmas. They will have to speak the language of personal faults and responsibilities. And they will have to join cultural conservatives in denouncing the contributions of popular culture, including the regnant sensibility of the permissive 1960s, to the corruption of character among the young.

(In Florida, where a 13-year-old arrested in connection with the killing of a tourist has a record of 56 arrests, juvenile criminals come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services. Note the title. There is no mention of crime or punishment, which may be one reason why there is such a high ratio of the former to the latter.)

The idea that conflict between grammar school boys and girls might result from jealousy, conflicting interests or plain bad behavior would allow the idea that not everything that passes between the sexes is sexual. That idea is repellent to people making careers in the burgeoning "gender equity" bureaucracies which the senators' package of bills would further enlarge. These bills would spend money on "leadership training" for girls, on an Office of Gender Equity in the Department of Education, and on much else. The caliber of the reasoning behind the bills can be gauged by this from Kennedy: "Despite the provisions of Title IX prohibiting sex discrimination in schools receiving federal funds, we continue to see differences in the educational achievement of boys and girls."

The legislation echoes two reports from the recently radicalized American Association of University Women, reports long on alarm and low on plausible data. "How Schools Shortchange Girls" said that teachers have always "unconsciously" treated girls and boys differently and are eager to do better but need federal money. "Hostile Hallways" reported a pervasive climate of sexual harassment, with 81 percent of all students, boys and girls, reporting themselves victims. The report found a need for federal money.

Here is what has been happening without Kennedy patrolling the hallways:

By 1979 there were as many women as men in colleges. Today women get most of the B.A. and master's degrees, and probably soon will be majorities in medical and law schools. (In the past 20 years female enrollment in medical schools has gone from 8 percent to 33 percent, in law schools from 5 percent to 41 percent.) More boys than girls flunk grades and are assigned to special education classes in primary and secondary schools. Although girls do not test as well as boys in math and science, they test better in reading and writing.

But Asian-American eighth-grade girls score significantly better than white males in science. How inconvenient. Families, not schools, make this difference, and many other differences that derive from the families' values, not the families' wealth or the nature of the schools. So, what is the Office of Gender Equity going to do about that?

Bob Haywood

The Controversy of Being Truthful

I had an interesting conversation in my Freshman Seminar when we talked about academic dishonesty. They were quite candid in advocating their belief that everyone has cheated academically at one time or another and they had a hard time believing the one or two people that said that they had never cheated. The more we talked, the more I had a sense that I was hearing evidence of a fundamental shift in values.

During the conversation, students acknowledged the lack of preparation was a common cause of cheating as was the pressure for grades brought on by the message of higher education about how important grades are in terms of getting a good job and the expected pressure from parents who are paying the bills. It was also noted that there was a point where plagiarism was acceptable in the very early years of education where bringing in almost verbatim paragraphs from an encyclopedia as a report seemed to be acceptable behavior. Many are ignorant about getting information from a printed resource and what is the acceptable process for writing information up in a paper.

The overriding rationale for cheating lay in the affirmation that "Everyone is doing it." The need for success at any cost in a system where grades are used to evaluate performance and academic performance is the basis for being employed is another excuse. The value that underlies this excuses is the belief that anything that enables me to get ahead with minimum change in my behavior is all right. It is this "Me first" ethic that concerns me. My conviction about this ethic is that the students who love it are more victims of their upbringing than proactive agents of a new set of values.

I have three concerns about this state of affairs in higher education and in our societal values. First, there was a time when there was some sense of upholding the common good which motivated young adults to live with more balance between meeting personal needs and the affirmation of basic moral virtues there were to be upheld for the common good. Honesty, integrity, respect for persons and serving the needs of the community all had widespread acceptance as basic principles for living. And while I understand many of the causes of this "Me first at any price" ethic, it still troubles me greatly.

Secondly, a value that I think is essential to achieve high level wellness is personal integrity. Integrity, by definition, is attained when one adopts a set of internal moral values that have universal positive benefits when lived up in a community and then working to the point that one's outer life reflects these internal values. It is hard for me to believe that anyone who cheats can be truly satisfied with and able to feel good about the prevailing messages of our culture about what is important. High moral personal integrity is one of the truly sustaining values that will carry us into a profound satisfaction with the life over the long haul.

Thirdly, there is often a prevailing laziness behind cheating. Lack of preparation, a common excuse for cheating, is rarely a reflection of a lack of ability. It is much more a reflection of a lack of time management, a lack of developing study skills and a lack of discipline—all curable problems. Spoiled by our high school success, too many college students are unwilling to reorder their priorities to put in the hard hours of studying and the hours needed to develop the skills of studying effectively or dealing with difficulties encountered in a particular classroom with a particular professor. Being a student is hard work, as hard as any career that will follow our university life. Our commitment to hard work and long hours to attain not only academic self but the acquisition of knowledge.

The question I find myself considering (and I think it is worth considering) is what can I do for myself and others to teach the value of grounding my behavior in fundamental principles such as honesty, sacrifice and integrity in matters small as well as great. I do not know. The forces of "Me first at any price" seem awfully strong these days. I struggle with it myself.

Phil Smith

Holy hydrodynamics, Badman, we are about to be drowned in an overgrown kettle of water

Did you ever want to just scream out at the top of your lungs, "DON'T MAKE ME ANGRY MR. MCGEE; YOU WOULDN'T LIKE ME VERY MUCH WHEN I'M ANGRY!" Hulk (and I don't mean Hogan) fans are sure to recognize these famous lines spoken by that mysterious, mild mannered doctor with a never ending wardrobe of Oxford shirts and generic blue jeans. I am speaking of course, of David Banner (or was it Brenner, or perhaps Barbour, not it must have been Ballard) who spoke those words to roving tabloid reporter Jack McGee who spent the better part of five years chasing around the big green monster which just happened to show up in the same town he was in EVERY WEEK.

Now your probably asking yourself, "what could this possibly have to do with global warming?" And my answer is of course, "I don't know, GO FIGURE!!!" But it does have to do with this week's opening theme of "Stupid Things I've Seen On Television." Consider for a moment "Robin, boy wonder (blunder)" of the original Batman series. My favorite line came when he and Batman were about to be drowned in an overgrown kettle of water. "Holy hydrodynamics, Batman, we are about to be drowned in an overgrown kettle of water!!!!" he would say. Batman, true to form and seeming as if he were excruciatingly constipated, would of course reply, "Not.....exactly.....Boy Wonder, I must reach Bat Belt and get.....instant.....Bat.....speed-dry.....before it's.....too.....late." He would then, just as the water topped his left nostril, break out the Bat instant speed-dry and thus insure for himself, Robin, and Alfred, that they would have a date for next week at the "same bat time" and on the "same bat channel."

Now that I've tortured you all so long, I must point out the reason for this "Silly Things I've Heard on Television" theme. My purpose, besides filling space, is to introduce a future NoBull Prize winning special edition entitled, "Silly Things Professors Say." Now I could sit here all day and tell silly things my professors have said but then, of course, I would never graduate from this University. I'm no rocket scientist, but I do know that it's not very smart to slap the hand that feeds you and/or bubbles in your grade on a "Seantron" sheet at the end of the semester. But...you, my faithful and semi-coherent readers can send in the favorite failed jokes and Freudian slips you may have heard echoing from the mouth of a professor. Names will be withheld if you desire and your anonymity (anonymity?) is guaranteed. Address all submissions to me, in care of The Seahawk and drop them in campus mail. I really need your help with this one, send in your best!

In other news, it appears that I've not been getting my job done as watchdog over campus services, offices, and agencies. In a recent resolution names some of my very favorites, including Randall Library, The RipOff Shop, the Housing Dept., and the Student STD Center. They didn't mention the Rental Cops this time, so I won't either. Aside from the involved agencies, the resolution was sent to Chancellor Leutze, several Vice Chancellors, and CBS News' Sixty Minutes. We'll keep an eye on this one.

This week's Hat's Off award goes to two friends of mine, Alison Jacobson and Mary Barnwell. I say "Hat's Off" to them both for being such faithful, semi-coherent readers and because I just know they will wake me some brownies or something. Again, it's good to know someone besides my mom reads the column.

The Shoe's Off award for this week goes to lame excuse for a Senior Class President, Ashley T. Wallace. Ashley is a good friend of mine but recently showed his slackitude by skipping out on the required SGA officer retreat. It seems that Ashley was, in his own words, "not Boy Scout enough," to attend the retreat because it was held at a campground. Now despite the fact that my roommate, Soph. Senator Daniel "Wuss" Williams, came back with a systemic case of pneumococcus pneumonia, I think that Wallace could have weathered the weekend. Shoe's Off, Mr. President.

Well fellow space travelers (we are all traveling through space, according to leading astrophysicists), that about wraps things up for this week. Before I go, I want to remind everyone that some former employees of the UNCW Physical Plant are holding a huge "everything must go" paint sale this weekend. I imagine they are raising bond (and I don't mean referendum) money or something. Just thought I'd let you know. Anyhow, we at The Seahawk... (I'm not really "At the Seahawk.") I just write for them, but I think "We at the Seahawk" sounds so official. Anyhow, we at The Seahawk are taking a journalistic hiatus for the next two weeks, so look for me to return to this same bat page in this same bat paper sometime after Fall Vacation. Until then...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

AIDS NAMES Quilt Comes to UNCW

BY AMY BRENNAN
News Editor

The AIDS NAMES Memorial Quilt, an international memorial to those who have died of AIDS, will be on display Oct. 21-24 in Trask Coliseum. The display will feature 76 12 x 12 panels, each remembering the life of someone who has died of AIDS.

The quilt was begun in 1987 by Cleve Jones, a gay rights activist. Jones made the first panel in memory of his friend Marvin Feldman, who died from AIDS. The idea for the quilt came to Jones after he spray painted Feldman's name onto a piece of cloth about the size of a grave. Other people began to make similar panels for their loved ones who had died from AIDS. Today, the quilt is over 15 football fields long and has been displayed in over 700 U.S. cities.

The NAMES Project Foundation displays portions of the quilt worldwide to encourage visitors to better understand and respond to the AIDS pandemic. Making the panels provides a positive means of expression for those grieving over the death of a loved one. For many, it is a release of emotion that may not have been possible before. It is also a means of raising funds for people living with HIV and AIDS.

The AIDS NAMES Memorial Quilt was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize in 1989. In 1990, Common Threads, a feature-length documentary film about the quilt, won an Academy Award. Since 1987, more than three and a half million people have visited the quilt, and more than $1 million has been raised through the sale of merchandise. In Wilmington, additional funds raised beyond display expenses will benefit GROW: A Community Service Corporation which provides necessary assistance to people living with HIV/AIDS.

Quilt panels are made by friends and family members and include a wide variety of materials from human hair to love letters to teddy bears. The idea is to put objects or ideas on the panels that represent or were meaningful to the person who has died.

Panels in memory of famous people are among the 24,000 panels that make up the quilt. Rock star, Freddy Mercury, and actor Rock Hudson both have panels.

Opening ceremonies of the display will begin Oct. 21 at 7 p.m. Visitors can see the quilt on Friday, Oct. 22 and Saturday, Oct. 23 from 10 a.m. till 9 p.m. daily. On Sunday, Oct. 24, the quilt will be on display from 10 a.m. till 5 p.m. with closing ceremonies to be held at 4 p.m. Admission is free but donations will be accepted at the door.

Funding for this display will come from corporate sponsorships and individual donations. Additional funds are urgently needed to cover the initial cost of bringing the quilt to Wilmington. Donations made out to "Names Quilt" can be sent to: Names Quilt Display, P.O. Box 315, Wilmington, NC 28402.

Volunteers are needed to help set up the display, monitor the quilt during viewing hours, assist with merchandise and information booths, and clean up.

There is still time to make a panel in memory of a loved one who died of AIDS. Call 675-9222, ext. 151 for more information on panel making.

Only the Nose Knows

Is there a new way to have sex involving your sinuses no one's told me about?

Over the last year I've read comments in the Seahawk discussing the on-campus health clinic and their apparent preoccupation with sex. I overheard students discussing their experiences with the clinic during and in-between classes.

One student said she limped over to the clinic because of an orthopedic problem. Amazingly, a swollen knee can reflect a potential symptom of a sexually transmitted disease—the hussy! Not to worry, folks, she received the SAFE SEX lecture and can swing her knee with the best of them now.

Another story I heard was from a student with a n irritating rash on her back. Off to the clinic she went. The diagnosis of some type of herpes virus (they all sound obscure to me) was made. Naturally she learned it can be sexually transmitted: $100 worth of medicine was suggested to treat her sinful ways. Later this itchy student discovered she was having an allergic reaction to Tide. I never knew laundry detergent could be so deviant.

Being of a somewhat more mature age, I figure, hey, they're young and just exaggerating. Then I had occasion to carry my aged and aching body over to the clinic. I went through the whine, whine I don't feel well routine—turns out be sinusitis. I'm handed my little authorization for legal drugs and I'm outta there.

But no! Before I can effect my escape I asked the dreaded sex question. My mouth drops open (big mistake when your sinuses run rampant), and I'm not in the mood for this crap. I try to be polite about it, so I whine a little more and offer my qualifications for sainthood: I'm a parent, full-time student, volunteer, and generally as responsible human being.

No, go, it's imperative to the medical gods I know about SAFE SEX, after all I'm a DIVORCED single parent with actual working body parts. I can see why they're concerned, with my mucously good looks, every man on campus is probably out there panting. Who can possibly resist me? I look like a soggy tissue paper rejected from hell and, due to my sore throat, my voice has reached that nasal note really attractive to any lechers lurking around the clinic. Get a grip!

My protest at this invasion into my sex life goes to no avail. I change tactics. Reverting to my normal cooperative self and despite my own bodily fluids (can you believe the copious amount of phlegm produced by your head?), I pitifully moan, "I'm old, I'm tired, I'm sick, my fever is the result of illness not lust—do I look like someone in the mood for sex?"

The response is an explanation of health concerns, etc., etc. Yeah, yeah, I think. I'm dying here and they want to know about my sex life. I mean, good God, I'm 41—not 21. I've had two kids, so yes, Virginia, there is a Santa Claus and obviously I've had sex.

Giving up, I agree to practice safe sex, get regular exams, and all that. I'm allowed to leave to collect my drugs. In a way the whole thing is somewhat reassuring, someone on campus actually thinks I might have a sex life.

Now, I'm not condoning unsafe sex and I appreciate the medical profession's efforts to prevent disease, but my visit to the clinic left me with two major questions: about the whole sex thing. Is the human nose a phallic symbol or something? Is there a sex act involving the sinuses? If so, how kinky!

I can see it now; there I'll be in my most seductive garb, fluttering my lashes, blowing my nose and croaking, "Darlin', we're going to do something different tonight!"

Come out and show your stuff!

"Natural High" style

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

Last Friday afternoon marked the "first sailing of the ALTERNATIVES!" sponsored "Natural High" sailing trips, part of its Outdoor Adventure Services. ALTERNATIVES!, with Rev. Bob Haywood, has arranged for student groups to spend an afternoon sailing the Atlantic or the Intercoastal Waterway for an afternoon of relaxation and adventure.

The adventures begin at one p.m. in the ALTERNATIVES! office. From there, the group of five students and peer educator Rhonda Sowards meet Rev. Haywood at his 27' Hunter sailboat near Carolina Beach.

Last Friday, the students were treated to one of the wonders that makes the area of the coast special this year: porpoises leaping out of the water.

As the vessel headed out the channel to open water, a shipmer was making her way back to port. One of her crew was dumping fish and shrimp off the stern.

There were approximately fifteen porpoises in the area slowly making circles about the feed site. Most of the time they only raised slightly out of the water, but occasionally one or two would leap clear of the water.

Rev. Haywood said that porpoises can usually be seen every other trip out.

Though the Fall semester trips are booked, Sowards said there will be more trips in the Spring.

For more information about the ALTERNATIVES! sailing trips, contact Rhonda Sowards in UU 104 or call 395-3683.

Refreshments are provided for the trip, but students are encouraged to eat lunch before the trip. Students can bring their own food or soft drinks.

Todd Allred orders from Itza Pizza

Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

A couple of nights ago, while studying alone in my room, I thought I heard someone calling my name. I walked out into the suite and found it empty. But I heard the voices again, and this time they were louder. Who were they? What did they want? Where were they? After about ten minutes, I realized who my visitors were - the growlies. The stomach growlies.

Yes, the growlies were calling my name, moaning relentlessly until I finally broke down and ordered a pizza. I was out of cash, so I couldn't call Domino's. I figured I still had eight or nine bucks left on my declining balance so I called Itza Pizza and ordered a student special - which includes a 12-inch pizza with one topping and a couple of soft drinks.

I asked for bacon and hung up the phone when they assured me "it'll be there shortly." I looked at my clock and saw that it was 11:30 PM. I yawned and got back to work. The growlies quieted down a little at first, anticipating being fed.

At about midnight, one of my suite mates got home and ordered a student special from Domino's. I began to get pretty sleepy, but the growlies started to get angry, so angry in fact, that I had to put my homework down for the night. I walked into the common room and sat down by the front door. Time seemed to go backwards as the growlies resumed their loud conversation from deep within my stomach. Finally, at 12:20, there was a firm rap at the door. I jumped up, excited and relieved that I would finally get to satisfy my hunger.

Well, my excitement changed to utter disappointment when I saw the man at the door was wearing a Domino's uniform. My suite mate marched in, paid the pizza guy, and sat down to enjoy a steaming hot, delicious pepperoni pizza. He looked at me and offered me a slice, which I refused. I wanted my own delicious pizza, you see. Not someone else's. Mine.

By this time, I was bitching just a much as the growlies, and found myself pacing furiously in circles around the suite.

Finally, and I do mean finally, at 12:36 am, my pizza arrived. The pizza dude apologized for taking so long and left. I was almost too sleepy to eat. Almost.

Before opening the box, I envisioned the succulent bacon, the hot, stringy cheese, the spicy sauce, and the crispy crust that was sure to lie beneath. I shouldn't have done that. In fact, I should have never opened the box, just like Pandora should never have opened her box. Actually, this pizza resembled something that would have been in Pandora's box of sins and evils. First of all, it was cold. The cheese was hard and there were several air pockets in the crust, making it look like I was eating the moon or something. I would describe the sauce, but there wasn't enough there to warrant description. But none these things could compare to the bacon.

Oh, the bacon. Let me tell you about that bacon. There were no tasty, crispy bits of genuine bacon on this pizza. Instead, there were three whole slices of rubbery looking, uncooked fat. I threw these strips away, too afraid to eat them, and microwaved a couple of slices of the remaining "pizza," only because I'd waited for over an hour for it, and because I had to silence the growlies. Needless to say, I went to bed disappointed and, unfortunately, still, hungry. Oh my, at least I knew I'd be able to eat breakfast in the morning. What a comforting thought!

Overall grade - D- (The delivery guy was polite, and my suite drink was actually pretty good!)

Next week - Todd gives Wagoner Hall another try!

Tattoo Time

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

In the recent past it seems as though there has been an explosion in the popularity of tattoos. Now at days it seems that the "cool" thing to do is to get a tattoo. That is fine but if it is the only reason you are getting one, then you might want to think twice. Don't get me wrong I am pro-tattooing and I feel everyone should have one, but not just to be cool.

In my opinion (and please, take this for what you feel it is worth) tattoos are a way to permanently attach to yourself something that has meaning in your life. In my own case, my tattoos are for myself, not to others can look at them. And I have them because they have deep rooted meanings to me. Before I got my first one, I did some soul searching to decide what I wanted. Finally I decided on what I loved the most, dragons. But the meaning of both of my dragon tattoos are much deeper than just an infatuation with these mythical beasts. The past four years hold many dear memories for me, but the best are of my carefree days of being a student. When I graduate in December I will no longer be in this lifestyle and over time, I will forget what it is like.

But my tattoos will always be there to remind me of my days in college.

Of course there are many other reasons behind my tattoos, but they are personal. I do however have a few personal pointers for people thinking about getting tattooed.

First, really think about it. Realize that it is permanent and it is much more expensive to remove than it is to get. Also, really think about what you want to get. Think of things that have meaning to you and go from there.

Next, talk to people. Talk to your friends who have tattoos. Ask total strangers about theirs as well. Many people don't know have asked me about tattooing and I am always more than happy to answer to the best of my ability. Most people who talk to me are just trying to absorb as much information from as many different sources as possible. Knowledge always leads to a better decision.

Also, go to tattoo studios and just look at what has been done. This will serve many purposes. It allows you a chance to look at different tattoos of the style you might want. It gives you an opportunity to get price ranges. And finally, it gives you a chance to talk to the experts (i.e. the tattoo artists).

My only other pointer is to think about where on your body you are going to get your tattoo. Think about the future and where you hope your life will take you. If you have plans on being a lawyer, then don't get a snake tattooed on your face. This will only hurt your career in the future. I personally have placed my tattoos in locations that can easily be covered or uncovered. One of my dragons is on the inside of my right ankle. Everyone and their brother can see it when I am wearing sandals, but if need be, a pair of shoes and socks can cover it up. My other one is on my right breast which I did for the same reason, to ease with which I can cover or uncover it. So in a nutshell, don't get a tattoo because it is the "in" thing to do, get one because you truly want it. I have every intention of getting more in the future. Here in Wilmington there are two places to get tattoos. One is Liquid Skin on College Road and the other is Marks of Distinction on Oleander Drive. Both of my tattoos were done by Hopic Quai at Marks of Distinction.

WLOZ Gaining Recognition

Sam Cuthrell
WLOZ Correspondent

Guess what! UNCW has its own campus radio station! For anyone who has been living under a rock lately, WLOZ is Wilmington's only alternative music station. Located at 89.3 on the Cable FM dial, its Top Ten list include Juliana Hatfield 3, Smashing Pumpkins, and more of the latest alternative music releases.

In the past month, the radio station has worked very hard on being more visible to the campus community. WLOZ had a booth at the Student Activities Fair, the LivWell fair, and is planning a fund-raising car wash.

For those of you who are familiar with WLOZ, a look at this year's schedule may cause a bit of shock. This semester's program guide boasts several rap and hip-hop shows, a jazz show, a reggae show, along with a techno dance show. There is also a gospel show on Sunday. This is, as always, complemented with lots and lots of alternative music for today's musical connoisseurs.

The only problem keeping WLOZ from mass acceptance is that it's not a FM station. Existence as a cable radio station requires a little more effort than just tuning your dial. However, it is a very simple process, and after you complete the hook-up, you are assured hours of listening pleasure.

For information on hook-up procedures, call 395-3086 (office line) or 395-3636 (request line).

All Tore Up, It Ain't Just a Band!

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Finally! A live show worth reporting about. Despite societal constraints on having a good time. My roommates and I hosted a party this past Saturday featuring beer and live music from All Tore Up.

These guys sure know how to rock it out. With a classic hard-core sound, they make for a powerful and quite loud afternoon. I was just talking to a friend last night on the phone and he summed it up perfectly when he said "You just don't see any good thrashing bands like that anymore."

Despite not having played together in over a month, the band sounded like they practiced the day before. They were really tightly together on the tempo changes which made for quite an awesome show.

John, the bassist, kept the power coming. He took the music from slow dirges to rip-roaring, finger blistering speeds. Add to this drumming by Jimmy, and you've got pure energy. I'm willing to bet that Jimmy's drums have a hangover after he gets done with them. I saw some stuff on Saturday that I didn't think could be done on drums. Rich's guitar playing is phenomenal in a bunch of effects to make it interesting (or was that the beer?).

All in all, the party was awesome. The musical performance was phenomenal and the beer was cold and never ending. Thanks to all who came out.

"14 Shots to The Dome"

Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

Put it to your lips, take a deep breath, then gulp it all down, it feels warm doesn't it? What am I talking about you might ask? I'm talking about doing shots. That's right, shots.

I was trying to figure out what to write about this week when editor extraordinaire Neal suggested I talk about shots, the best places to do shots, and give some suggestions as to what shots are simple and easy to do. So, after lots of hard work and investigative reporting on my part (this is such a rough assignment) here are a few of my favorite things.

I don't think I, personally, can talk about shots without mentioning Tijuana Flats. One of my friends once purchased 3 rounds of tequila and lemon drops for a table of seven. I don't suggest tequila for novices but lemon drops are simple and not too rough. Some people burn the lemon by soaking it in 151 (Mugg's in Greensboro comes to mind) others just soak it with sugar and give it to you. Either way is fine.

A lot of people swear by Crook's Downtown. I'm told that they have a long list of shots and shooters at economical prices. I've been there at least a hundred times, but I don't remember ever doing a shot. Maybe that's a sure way to tell I have, not remembering it.

Red's has 22 :00 shooters on Sunday and Wednesdays. After you drink the free beer (refer to "Journey of a Week" article) try a test tube of jagmeister. If you're not into that, they usually have some other, less manly, sweet and weak kind of shots for you girls out there.

Rock 'Ola Cafe offers a good supply of shooters as well as plain old shots. It's the only place I know where you can get a 252 chilled or at room temperature (ask Lane and Dan)! A 252 is a mix of Bacardi 151 and Wild turkey 101, it is not for the weak of heart.

If you're ever in Chapel Hill, let me tell you, you can get some good shots almost anywhere on Franklin Street. Chuck says he's almost died one night in Four Corners.

Greensboro has the aforementioned Mugg's on Battleground and another one on High Point Road. I was there this past weekend and lemon drops were all over the place.

Lance would be mad at me if I didn't mention straight shots of Jim Beam, his favorite. Walt swears by 151, but he's one of the few people I know who can stomach it straight. Duane thinks that Green Demons are a wonderful way to lose consciousness. My personal favorite is Rebel Yell. I've done shots or Rebel Yell all over the planet, from Montreal to surfers paradise and it's never done me wrong. On that note, I'm on my way out the door, thinking of good times past and wondering if the liquor store is still open.

The Psychology behind the Citibank Classic Visa card, and the emotional security of the Photocard.

The Citibank Classic Visa instills in students feelings of safety, security, and general wellness not unlike those experienced in the womb. Therefore, it is the mother of all credit cards. ¶ Some experts attribute these feelings to the Citibank Photocard, the only credit card with your photo on it. A voice inside says, "This is me, really me." (As opposed to, "Who the heck is that?"—a common response to the photo on one's driver's license.) It's an immediate form of ID, a boost to your self-image. ¶ Of course if your card is ever lost or stolen and a stranger is prevented from using it, you'll feel exceptionally good (showing no signs of Credit Card Theft Nervosa). ¶ Other experts point to specific services, such as The Lost Wallet™ Service that can replace your card usually within 24 hours. Or the 24-Hour Customer Service line, your hotline, if you will, for any card-related anxiety whatsoever. ¶ Further analysis reveals three services that protect the purchases you make on the Citibank

Subject suffering from Credit Card Theft Nervosa.

Classic Visa card, at no additional cost. 1. Buyers Security™ can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase¹ (preventing, of course, Insecurity).

2. Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ allows one to extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.² 3. And Citibank Price Protection assures you of the best price. You need only see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150³ (hence no Post Purchase Depression). ¶ Special student savings are particularly therapeutic. There's the free Citibank Calling Service™ from MCI to save up to 26% on long distance calls versus AT&T³ (You're encouraged to call Mom and Dad regularly preventing Parenta Non-Supportus.) And a $20 Airfare Discount⁴ on any domestic flight.

(Case studies indicate that a Fear of Flying is overcome when Spring Break in sunny Florida is a possibility.) Not to mention the low variable interest rate of 15.4%⁵ and no annual fee for college students. ¶ Suffice it to say, you'll have a credit card you can depend on while building a credit history. So call 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19, to apply over the phone (students don't need a job or a cosigner) or to have your photo added to your Citibank Classic Visa card. ¶ If we say that a sense of Identity is the first component of the Citibank Classic Visa card, a sense of Security the second, and a sense of Autonomous Will from your newfound financial independence the third, don't be crazy...Call.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Currently at Duke, there is an organization called "Men Acting for Change" that provides a forum to discuss issues and answer questions men have about their frustrations, confusion, experiences with their past and with women. Mr. Spruance said he hopes to form a UNCW Men Acting for Change group.

The RAD program has been received enthusiastically by the women of UNCW. The first two three-week sessions are all ready booked full. RAD is a program developed by Larry Nadeau, the training officer of the Poquoson (Virginia) Police Department, and Sheri L. Jachetta, a residence hall director at the College of William and Mary. They observed that most self-defense course were based on theory or martial arts. Theory, they knew, doesn't offer hands-on experience and martial arts can take years to learn, so they incorporated theory and basic martial art techniques into a 12-hour course. Two of the hours are lecture and the remaining ten are technique. The cost of the program is $12. The money is used to pay for the manual that comes with the program.

After the initial course, a woman can retake the course for free as long as she has her manual. The course is taught by both men and women but has solely women students. UNCW University Police Investigator Shawn Thomas, one of UNCW's instructors, said the reason for that was "so a man couldn't take the class and learn which techniques women are being taught."

At the end of the course, each woman must successfully defend herself against an assault. The "assault" will be done by an instructor dressed in protective clothing. The woman can use all the force she can to get away from the instructor.

The RAD program on UNCW is a joint effort of the University Police, the Student Government Association (SGA), the Student Development Center and Reach Out!. The SGA provided $1,258 for two complete "assault" uniforms.

The Student Development Center provides counseling to women who have been victimized. The SDC works in conjunction with the Wilmington Rape Crisis Center. The SDC is located in Westside Hall, second floor.

A recent three-part series in the Wilmington Morning Star newspaper portrayed a few women's experiences of prosecuting a sexual offender. The series did not offer much hope to women who take their case to trial.

Currently, because of prison overcrowding and a court system that puts the woman's character and past sexual experiences on trial as well as the accused rapist, many women find that the process is not worth pursuing. That, however, may soon change. Senator Joe Biden (D-Del.) is pushing through the Senate legislation that will make sexual assault a federal violation of civil rights, allowing victims of what he terms "gender-based crimes" to sue their attackers for damages without waiting for criminal prosecution.

Sen. Biden's "Violence Against Women Act of 1993", when approved, will create new penalties for sex crimes, provide funding for more police presence in high-risk areas, create federal penalties for abusive husbands, make gender-based assaults a violation of federal civil rights laws, give training to State and Federal judges to increase their sensitivity about crimes against women, and improve existing laws on violence against women.

Recent federal legislation has made it mandatory for universities and colleges to provide a sexual assault program on campus. UNCW, however, has had such a program in place since the early 1980s. UNCW Dean of Students Pat Leonard says though the school has always had an open-door policy, no victim has formally filed a complaint in the past two years.

Maybe now, with the Reach Out! program, RAD, a "Speakin' Greek" session, the Student Development Center's counseling, and the university's open-door policy women on campus will realize there are people who care.

Telephone numbers of interest are: Reach Out!, 395-3577; Dean of Students, 395-3119; University Police, 395-3184; Student Development Center, 395-3746; SDC day-time emergency number, 395-3065; and Rape Crisis Center, 341-5799.

There will be a "Take Back the Night" march on Tuesday, October 19, at the Wilmington City Hall at 8 p.m. If there are any questions, contact Renee Hughes or Renee McGill at 343-0703.

Directories Are Here!

The 1993-'94 UNCW telephone directories have arrived. Commuter students can pick them up at the University Union Information Center. Directories are delivered to on-campus students, faculties, staff, and departments.

The directory lists all faculty, staff, and students as well as their addresses and phone numbers. It has a complete listing for all university offices including fax numbers. The yellow pages complete the directory as an area guide to local businesses. Emergency procedures and numbers are included. There is even a map in case you have trouble finding your way around campus. The directory also includes a UNCW calendar of events through 1995 so you can go ahead and mark school holidays in your calendar.

This year, any faculty, staff, or student can win a free trip for two to Cancun, Mexico. To enter, fill out the entry blank on page 41 and send it in.

Wise Alumni House will be open to UNCW alumni, students, their families and the public as part of Family Weekend activities at UNCW Oct. 1-3.

The UNCW Alumni Association will hold informal "hard hat" parties from 4:30 to 6 p.m. Saturday, Oct. 2 and 1 to 3 p.m. Sunday, Oct. 3 at the Neoclassical Revival mansion at 1713 Market St.

Initial renovations to Wise House are nearly complete and the event is intended to welcome alumni and other friends of the university to UNCW's future alumni home.

For more than 50 years, Wise House was the home of heiress Jessie Kenan Wise. After her death in 1968, her grandchildren, Lawrence Lewis, Jr. and Mary Lily Flagler Lewis Wiley, donated the imposing mansion to the university.

Earlier this year, the UNCW Alumni Association successfully secured a loan of $400,000 from United Carolina Bank to cover basic renovations to the house. The alumni association must repay the loan over a four-year period and has initiated an active fund-raising campaign for Wise House.

Ultimate Frisbee

BY SUSAN TURNER
Ultimate Writer

Blue skies, beaming sun, friendly faces, green fields (mostly), dogs barking, disc flying...yes another ultimate Frisbee tournament has come and gone. (And finally there is something in the paper about it!) UNCW hosted the annual Fall Fling which brought ultimate families all the way from Philli, PA and Atlanta, GA to sunny Wilmington for a weekend full of ultimate thrills. Many thanks to Todd Leber, Brian Longfield, and all those home teams (3 men and 2 women) for contributing to such an excellent tournament. Spectators as well seemed to be caught up in the excitement of it all. A spectator/player Amy Clapp, wrapped it up exclaiming, "Oh my God." You just have to see it to believe it.

If you have never seen ultimate played, you are missing out. Wilmington will be hosting several tournaments in the Spring, but if you don't want to stay in the dark until then, here are practices (both men and women) practically everyday around 4 or 5 on Brooks Fields and the Gazebo field. Don't be a stranger.

Seaweed Ultimate definitely made its mark on the weekend. Since there are close to 30 women participating on behalf of the seaweed, 2 teams were formed for the weekend - Team A and Team B. For Team B, the tournament was very much a learning experience. Although they lost every game, 2 of the games were lost by only one point. Team A swept the tournament only losing to one team (Ozone, from Atlanta, who won the tournament). The major accomplishment was the semifinals when Team A beat the Raleigh Women, GRITS, whom Seaweed has not beaten for 2 years. Team A went out eagerly to beat Ozone in the final game, but Ozone rose to the occasion and headed back to Atlanta with a victory.

The Seamen (UNCW's Men Ultimate Team) are going through a transition/growth phase, which means lots of new dudes. Unfortunately they lost all of their games but walked away from the weekend with priceless experience. Good luck to you Seamen—chins up! The other 2 men's teams (City Teams) Port City Slickers and Howie's Team made it to the quarter finals. PCS lost to Philli and Howie's Team lost to Ring (Raleigh) in the Quarters. The men's finals was a cakewalk for Ring who beat D.C. 15 to 5.

Sailing

BY GLENN WALKER
Sailing Writer

The UNCW Sailing Team went to the College of Charleston (C of C) to sail in the North Points #1 Regatta this past weekend. This regatta was the first of a series of 3 regattas to be held in the North Point district. The UNCW Team showed improvement over past regattas as the team finished 3rd overall! The A and B team taking one first, 2 seconds, 3 thirds, 5 fourths, and 1 fifth. The B team finished with one second and several thirds and fourths.

The A team consisted of Glenn Walker as skipper and Melanie Ahlberg as crew. B team was Scott Ensign as skipper and Laural Collins as crew. The overall placing at the North Point Regatta were first place to College of Charleston, second to Clemson, third UNCW, fourth Citadel, fifth UNC-Chapel Hill and sixth Duke.

The next North Point Regatta is at Clemson Oct. 9 and 10, and the third and last of the series is here at UNCW at Wrightsville Beach in Banks Channel Oct. 16 and 17.

CREW

BY BRYAN GIBSON
Crew Writer

This Sunday, October 3rd, the UNCW Crew Team will be hosting its 1st Annual Riverfest Fall Sprints. This regatta will be held on the crew's home turf of the Cape Fear River, and will be a Riverfest Event. The races will start around 9:30 am and end sometime that afternoon. UNCW has invited the following crews: UNC-Chapel Hill, Duke, NC State, Clemson, Furman, The Citadel, and other crews in the region.

The UNCW Crew is without a coach, so this is quite an undertaking for them to set up. The details have been a long time in the making, so show your Seahawk pride and come out to Riverfest and cheer out the sport known as the "ultimate in team sports" - Crew.

The best place to check out the races will be at the finish line near Waterfront Park in Downtown Wilmington. This also will become an annual event and hopefully will get better and better each year. The Crew would like to thank the Riverfest Committee Association for their continued support, and the Cape Fear River Rowing Club.

MUSCLE SORENESS

From Glamour Mag. Oct. 1993

Muscle soreness after a workout is a sign that muscles are repairing themselves and becoming stronger. Though some of us consider this "good pain," it isn't pleasant when it lasts up to a week. A recent study done by Scott M. Haason, Ed.D., P.T., associate professor of physical therapy at Texas Women's University in Houston, shows that taking ibuprofen within two hours after a strenuous workout may significantly decrease muscle soreness. Dr. Haason refers to "strenuous" meaning that "your muscles are quivering and shaking afterward and they feel fatigued and uncontrollable." Though ibuprofen may help reduce the pain, Dr. Haason warns against using it routinely because of the risk of stomach ulcers, kidney problems, and liver problems associated with chronic use. Save the pre-exercise ibuprofen for an activity that has caused muscle soreness in the past.

For those of you who are tempted to stay in bed and recover from your workout, inactivity is actually bad for sore muscles. Continue working out at a lower intensity and for less time than normally would. This helps rid the muscles of lactic acid and literally works out muscle soreness.

FLAG FOOTBALL

BY VICTOR NAVA
Sports Writer

It is now well into the sixth week of the new semester for the '93-'94 school year. Now that classes have begun and stress has accumulated what could better release that stress than football? The summer is officially over and fall is well under way along with Saturday afternoon collegiate games, Sunday's professional games, and the well loved Monday Night Football. However, not only is football played by those on T.V., but as well by those who love to play the game for game's sake.

The Intramural Flag Football program here at UNCW showcased show-downs between the top two teams in each of the men's league this week, starting in the Independent league with "Total Chaos" and the "Misfits." The trash, showy style of "Total Chaos" prevailed in the end in a game whose outcome was decided between two extra point opportunities: one converted and one squandered away. The 7-6 final was a perfect score to reflect the hard battle fought by both teams throughout the entire game.

In the Fraternity league, a show-down of two top teams was held on Wednesday. Sigma Nu, coming off a 26-0 shellacking of then, undefeated Lambda Chi, tried to avoid a letdown when they ran into a hard-nosed, stubborn KA team. In an excitement filled game that featured a kick-off return for a touchdown by Sigma Nu and a 73 yard touchdown pass from Doug Scharf to Sam Shelby of KA, the outcome was once again decided by a single point conversion. With Sigma Nu winning that one extra point, it makes you see why little things really do mean a lot.

The Office of Recreation would like for everyone to stay tuned for upcoming Intramural Sport and Special Events. In Intramural play, volleyball and Outdoor Basketball begin Monday, September 27. As for special events, a 1993 Spikefest (Doubles Sand Volleyball Tournaments) will be held on Oct. 2. Registration will begin Sept. 27 through Oct. 1 and check in will be held at "00 on the day of the tournament. Games will be played on the Gazebo Sand Courts. All are welcome to join in on the fun.

Cross Country

BY ERIC TOTTON
Sports Editor

The UNCW Seahawk Cross Country traveled to Leesburg, VA to participate in the Morven Park Invitational. Against a strong field that included three nationally-ranked teams competing for both the men and women. "We wanted to compete in a field like this to gain recognition - not just in North Carolina but along the whole East Coast," said second year coach Sprecher.

The Seahawks had a strong showing for their second race of the season. "I was very pleased with the results," said Sprecher. "I think we showed that we could compete with some of the stronger teams in the nation."

In the men's 8K race featuring 3rd ranked Villanova, 9th ranked Georgetown, and 24th ranked Brown University the UNCW men come in with a strong 7th place team finish out of the field of 14 total teams. Finishing the race for the men were Tim Cox (25:54/20th), Jeff Tieggs (26:37/39th), Danny Cash (26:54/45th), Nick Thibodeaux (27:40/60th), Thomas Coughlin (28:32/71st), Frank Ingrassia (29:11/78th), and Jeff Watkins (29:26/80th). The field for the men included 123 runners.

In the women's 5K race that included 7th ranked Villanova, 2nd ranked Georgetown and 5th ranked Penn State, the UNCW women showed improvement with a 10th out of 17 teams finish. Top runners for the UNCW women were Heather Penner (19:21/59th), Tracy Webb (19:27/64th), Tricia Callison (19:51/71st), Winifred Winston (20:15/77th), Shannon Williamson (20:23/81st), Deidre Heyde (21:35/97th), and LaShandra Carter (23:55/110th). The women's field had a total of 143 runners.

The Seahawks next meet will be on Oct. 2nd at the Methodist Invitational in Fayetteville, NC.

Sacha Doran is this year's captain on the UNCW Women's Tennis Team. After losing five seniors last year, this year's tennis team comprises of nine women, including Sacha as the only senior. Sacha is a communications major from Old Chatham, New York and will graduate this coming May.

Sacha's parents intense interest in tennis while she was growing up lead her to become the outstanding player she is today. Since seventh grade, Sacha has been playing competitive tennis.

After transferring from Nazareth College in Rochester, NY at the end of her freshman year, Sacha chose to come to UNCW for a few reasons. Her brother attend a North Carolina school which motivated her to come down south. The size and location of UNCW also contributed to her decision. But the ultimate reason for her transferring to UNCW was because of the tennis program and the persistence of Coach Whiting who saw her play at a tournament that previous summer.

Going into her third and final season playing tennis for UNCW, Sacha feels her coach has added greatly to her success. "Coach Whiting is so dedicated to the team and puts in a lot of time. It is because of her drive that makes us (the team) more dedicated. She supports us on and off the court," Sacha boasts about her coach. Coach Whiting has established a good and effective relationship with her players and will go out of her way to do anything for her players outside of tennis. Her proficient organizational skills, true dedication and appropriate discipline ethics has made Coach Whiting the solid foundation for the unity and desire of the UNCW's Women's Tennis Team.

Despite the fact the tennis team is "young" and are in a tough conference, Sacha believes the team has a lot of potential to do well this season. "Everyone is working hard - more so than in the past - and the girls have a desire to do well," Sacha comments about the great attitude of her teammates. She hopes the team will have a winning season. Her personal goal for her final season is to gain more confidence in the game of tennis itself, which she feels creates a better player.

Sacha believes playing a sport during college is very beneficial. She states, "It makes me better organized, because I have to manage my time with tennis. I don't have the time to do things later, I have to do them now." Her professors in the communications department are helpful and give the individual attention a student need to do well an excel. Sacha also believes the coaches have an added insight to contribute in teaching about relationships with others and the practical means of life. She notes, "I couldn't imagine going through school without playing a sport."

After graduating Sacha will continue to be involved competitively in the life long sport of tennis. She will also continue to teach private lessons as she has done in the past. Sacha now believes she might want to become a tennis coach herself after graduation; she was inspired by the possible avenue only after experiencing the relationship with and respect she has for Coach Whiting. "Coach Whiting has a lot to offer and makes it (playing tennis) very exciting," Sacha states.

Sacha is thinking about a career in broadcasting or public relations after she takes some time off after graduation to travel to Europe. She likes helping and meeting new people and doesn't find herself in an occupation where she is behind a desk.

Sacha is involved in InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, the advertising club, and is currently doing an internship with Channel 3. She has been on the Dean's List and received "most improved" in tennis her first year here at UNCW.

Sacha's family is very supportive of basically any decision she has to make. They travel from New York to see her matches and offer advice whether she is winning or losing. "My family is wonderful. My parents are my best friends along with my brother. I am very fortunate to have such a close family," Sacha remarks.

Tales From the Dumpster

BY ERIC TOTTON

Sports Editor

After a week off from the dumpster I'm back and ready to tackle another controversial issue. The topic this time is an issue that is here on good old UNCW.

The subject for this week is UNCW's Varsity Cheerleading Team and their request for enough money to purchase new uniforms. Before I go any further, in case anybody doesn't know, the Cheerleaders were placed 2nd in the National Cheerleading Association sponsored by the Universal Cheerleading Association. They also appeared on ESPN.

This year the cheerleading team had requested money from the SGA for uniforms. The vote has been tabbed for next week so we don't know how it will turn out yet. They also received their budget money from the Athletic Department which I consider pretty small since they are recognized as a varsity sport.

My whole point in this - it is absolutely ridiculous not to finance the cheerleaders who have done so well. As far as the SGA goes - if the SGA can give money to organizations that don't appear on national TV and place 2nd nationally then surely they can give money to a group that does. The SGA did give them money when they made it to Nationals they're not all bad, but come on. The cheerleaders promote the University on a national level. I think now uniforms could at least be given to them. Now to the Athletic Department, the cheerleaders are a varsity sport - so treat them like one. If the Basketball team was on ESPN and placed 2nd nationally I'm very sure that enough money could be squeezed up. Again, they're a varsity sport so treat them like one. You would think that an organization that represents us so well, on national TV so well, would be practically forced to wear new uniforms. Give the cheerleaders the recognition they deserve.

Well that's it for now. Until next time keep reaching for the stars and keep your head out of the dumpster. See you next time - same time, same place.

Seahawk Bucky Corban is thwarted by Wolfpack keeper Kyle Campbell during State's 4-2 triumph at Brooks Field. UNCW will be back in action Oct. 12 versus East Carolina University.

'Hawks Play State Close, But Come Up Short, 4-2

BY JIM CLARK
Editor in Chief

Wednesday's intrastate match-up between N. C. State and the Seahawks was billed as a great game. They didn't disappoint the crowd of 450.

"We were disappointed not to win, but we gave a good account today," UNCW coach Keith Cammidge said following the game. "We're disappointed but not discouraged."

The Wolfpack's team speed proved to be the difference the 4-2 State win. "They kept us busy all day," Cammidge added.

UNCW came out firing on goal. Striker Bucky Corban, the team's leading scorer had a couple of chances in the first fifteen minutes of the game, but came up short.

Todd Pascarella scored at the 21:30 mark of the first half. He gathered a Corban rebound about seven yards out a kicked it in.

State and UNCW seasawed up and down the field for a few minutes before Simon Weiss evened the score by deflecting in a rebound off a corner kick.

State's speed then took over the game. State coach George Tarantini said, "Our speed allowed us to overcome our weaknesses in the back. (UNCW) showed our weaknesses."

State's midfield took control of the game for the rest of the half. At the 38:14 mark, Shobha Beachum scored on a break-away to make the score 2-1 State.

State's momentum continued in the second half. Neither team was able to amount a sustained threat, though UNCW managed a couple of corners at the midway point of the half.

Beachum scored again at the 73:27 mark on an assist from Mark Jones.

Greg LaMendola tallied a penalty kick at the 84:30 mark to draw UNCW to within one, but State's speed counteracted UNCW's last ditched pressure and Jones scored off an assist from Beachum two minutes later.

Outstanding for UNCW was freshman sweeper Steve Korovaki. He continually broke up State assaults with clearing passes and tough man-on-pressure.

Seahawk keeper Kenny Lentz made five saves while his counterpart, Kyle Campbell, made four.

UNCW will travel to Virginia this weekend for a couple of conference games. Friday the Seahawks play William and Mary and Sunday they take on Richmond.

The next home game for UNCW is Oct. 12 when archival ECU comes to town for a 4 p.m. kick-off.

Pre-registration for the Spring 1994 semester is Nov. 1 - 12. Students with outstanding balances will not be allowed to pre-register without first paying off their debts. Call 395-3147 or go by student Accounts in James Hall if you have any questions.

The English Department and the department of Political Science announced new minors at UNCW. English and African-American Studies minors are being offered this upcoming spring semester, 1994.

The English minor requires six hours from ENG 211, 212, 223, 224, 225, and 226. It also requires a three-hour English writing or language course and twelve additional hours in English including at least nine hours at the 300-400 level with an overall 2.0 average in all courses completed. If interested, you are encouraged to visit the English Department.

The new African-American Studies minor requires eighteen hours including nine hours in HST 261, ENG

232, and PLS 340. The remaining hours may be taken from a list of electives including at least three hours at the 300 level or higher. Interested students can contact the Department of Political Science or coordinator Dr. Earl Sheridan.

UNCW offers thirteen other minors in different departments including three from the foreign language department: French, Spanish, and German. Other minors offered are: anthropology, chemistry, geography, gerontology, history, philosophy, political science, science, the humanities, the humanities, society, and sociology. UNCW Attacks Alcohol Awareness

BY JULIE GRACE
Staff Writer

UNCW has received a $1,000 grant for their continuous effort and commitment regarding alcohol education. Sandy Errante, the program director of Alternatives! accepted the award from the InterAssociation Task Force on Alcohol and Other Substance Abuse Issues at a ceremony in Washington, D.C.

Coors Brewing Company funded the award. Errante said that the money would be used to continue Alternatives! efforts in educating the students about alcohol and substance abuse. She also expressed concern about accepting such an award from a company that manufactures alcohol.

"We're in the business of preventing and educating people about alcohol use and abuse," Errante said, "It's a conflict of interest to accept funds from the beer industry because I feel that they contribute to the problem we're trying to correct." She said that Coors does deserve credit for their prevention and education programs but that it is minuscule compared to the amount of time they spend soliciting.

Alternatives! conducted a Substance Usage Survey last October which showed that of the on-campus students who responded, an average of 4.3 drinks per week was reported. The average number of drinks per week consumed by both on-campus and off-campus students who responded to the survey was 6.6 which is considerably higher than the national average of 5.0 drinks per week as reported by students across the nation. The survey also showed that there was an increase in binge drinking (five or more drinks in one sitting) among on-campus residents. In the 1992 survey, 22.7% of the on-campus respondents reported having engaged in binge drinking once a week. The same survey conducted in 1990 reported 20.8% of the on-campus respondents as participation in binge drinking once a week.

Errante said that underage drinking is a definite problem at the university and that the majority of the participants in Alternatives! ASAP (Alcohol-Substance Abuse Prevention) program are referred because of underage drinking.

While the statistics show an increase in on-campus and underage drinking, there is evidence that the negative consequences as a result of consumption has decreased. Less DWI/DUI's are being reported as well as violent behavior and property damage. The university has tightened their policies concerning on-campus drinking and has been enforcing residence hall regulations more strictly than they have in the past. "Because of the university's on going commitment and support of alcohol and substance abuse education," Errante says, "things are changing."

Crime On Campus?

BY MELANIE HURLEY
Staff Writer

Is UNCW safe compared to other campuses in North Carolina? Detective Charlie Willis of the campus police said that last year, UNCW "ranked very good in comparison to other schools." He said that the biggest problem on campus is bicycle larceny. The second biggest problem occurs in the residence halls. Detective Willis said that forceful entry into residents' rooms "is very rare;" the most common crimes on campus are "crimes of convenience," which occur when residents leave their rooms unlocked.

Detective Shawn Thomas feels that "the statistics speak for themselves." She said there is a lot of physical security on campus, such as the emergency call boxes and the Seahawk Shuttle.

Detective Willis did say that there are sometimes reports of suspicious people on campus at night, but there is "very little problem getting them to leave." If a person is on campus for no reason, then he or she is given a trespass notice that is valid for one year. If the person returns to campus during that year, he or she is arrested on trespassing charges. Overall, Detective Willis feels that the "campus is a safe place."

If the campus is so safe, then why the added security in the residence halls with the desk receptionists? Bill McCartney, the director of Housing and Residence Life, said that in the past few years, there have been problems with non-residents wandering through the halls, and with people going door to door selling things or distributing literature.

McCartney felt that adding a combination lock to the front doors of the residence halls was not sufficient. He said people would give out the combination, or the door would always be propped open, and the purpose of having a lock on the doors would be defeated. McCartney said he wants students to feel safe from unwelcome visitors. He thinks society has become "more violent" and "more dangerous," and he wanted to take a "proactive stance" by eliminating unsolicited visitors before a problem occurred. He felt the best way to do this is by monitoring the front doors. McCartney said that after a year, the Housing Office will see what adjustments need to be made, but he feels that more security measures will probably not be needed.

Television Station Proposed for UNCW

BY KRISTY SHUMAKER
Staff Writer

Student Services Coordinator Phil Feiner announced last Tuesday a project to provide a campus television station.

Feiner said he thought a television station was a bright idea for UNCW, since other schools such as North Carolina State University and UNC Charlotte also have stations. "On other campuses, everything is moving toward television, and I would hate to stand by and let our university become the dinosaur of communications," Feiner said.

Feiner, also chairman of the Student Grievance Board, and several members of his committee are working to develop a proposal for the station, which they will present to the Student Government Association Senate. SGA oversees all campus media. Feiner said the proposal will be ready to go within the next month.

In the meantime, Feiner and members of the Student Grievance Board are circulating petitions at various campus locations, such as classrooms and The Hawk's Nest, to build support for the station. The petitions will be presented along with the proposal to the Senate. Feiner said around 240 signatures had been collected as of last Tuesday.

Feiner said the television station would involve three phases of programming. The first phase involves scrolling information, or an information board similar to one used at NCSU's station. This would provide quick access to information about campus events via screens in locations such as the University Center, and would be updated constantly. Feiner said, "Students coming into the Center could look up and see whether there's an ACE movie playing, or where someone's giving a talk." Feiner said he hoped the information board would also report weather and hurricane warnings.

The second programming phase involves electronic news gathering to provide on-the-spot coverage of campus events such as Convocation and SGA meetings. Feiner said, "We would broadcast the true stories that are going on on campus." For example, the station would cover what's happening in UNCW politics, he said. Feiner said, "Students don't realize what's really going on, like what the administration is doing or how the student power is being used by the administration or what students are trying to do to get respect from certain faculty members."

This phase would also include news around Wilmington relevant to UNCW students. "People don't have to read to understand what's going on, and on television, they can get it in 30 minutes," Feiner said.

The final phase involves full-blown programming, including movies, plays, talk shows, video shows, and instrumental sports coverage. Feiner indicated that much of the programming would be produced by students and groups such as Starving Artist. Feiner said he thought this would give students interested in working in broadcast communications an opportunity to gain experience. Students would be trained to shoot and edit their own productions. Feiner said, "One of the worst things about UNCW, which is in one of the biggest filming locations in the nation, is that we have no film school or broadcast students to get experience." He said the station would be operated by students.

Students would also fund the station via fees already allocated to SGA. However, Feiner said money would not be taken away from clubs and organizations also financed through student fees.

Racism, or Thugs

WASHINGTON—The April 1992 verdicts in Simi Valley came like an unexpected blow to the solar plexus. The cops who brutally beat Rodney King were innocent?

The ordinary chain in police brutality cases is that each person of no standing claims to have been beaten by the police. The police deny it, counterclaiming that the alleged victim was himself unruly and abusive. And the rest of us believe as our experience leads us to believe: The cops are right, the alleged victim is right, or the truth lies somewhere between. Usually the cases don't even make the news.

The Rodney King case made the news because, for once, it wasn't just the word of a nobody against the cops. America was the witness. We saw the beating on videotape, and that was the reason for our shock: That 12 decent men and women could see what we saw and refuse to believe their eyes.

How could the jurors look at that tape—no matter what else may or may not have happened before or after the critical frames—and find the accused officers innocent of excessive force and assault?

Now here we are again. A jury of decent men and women watch a tape showing a vicious and unprovoked attack on Reginald Denny and cannot bring themselves to say they see what they see.

The result must again disappoint those who love justice, though, in truth, this week's verdict in Los Angeles was nowhere near as shocking as that in Simi Valley. This time we were prepared for the bizarre (including the possibility that the jury might try to use the Denny case as a make-up for the King case). Further, we had been told that the Denny charges might be tough to prove, no matter the evidence of our own eyes. Finally, the two men charged in the Denny case were convicted of something, though they were acquitted of the most serious charges against them.

I can't tell you that I wish Damian Williams and Henry Watson would spend the rest of their lives in prison. I can't tell you that I'm certain it was their intention to kill or permanently maim Reginald Denny, though it does seem clear that what I saw on the videotape goes far beyond a mere misdemeanor.

I can only tell you that what happened in Los Angeles this week looks more like a political/racial/riot-prevention balancing act than justice.

Williams was convicted of felony mayhem for his part in the Denny assault (a count that could cost him up to ten years in prison) and of lesser charges in attacks on other people in the rioting that followed the Simi Valley verdicts.

Watson, convicted of a single misdemeanor assault charge, already has spent more time in jail (17 months) than the one-year maximum for the conviction.

Maybe the critics are right when they say the prosecution "overcharged" the assessed men; a spray can tossed at a car was charged as assault with a deadly weapon. Certainly the defendants had a clever lawyer.

I mean, he has me going, and I was convinced that Williams and Watson (if they indeed were the man on that videotape) were guilty. But guilty of what? Of attempted murder? Well, whoever hurled that brick at Denny's head didn't appear to be wishing him long life.

But listen to Williams' lawyer, Edi M.O. Faal: The cops didn't arrive for some time after that brick crashed into Denny's skull. Nobody grabbed the attackers, or otherwise interfered with them. Denny didn't run away, for the simple reason that he couldn't. But the hurler of that brick didn't hurl it again. If they wanted to kill Denny, they clearly had time and opportunity to do so. Where's the intent to kill?

And if they didn't intend to kill, what should they be convicted of? In the absurd position of being dissatisfied with the outcome and unable to say what the outcome should have been. Maybe the jurors had the same problem. In the end they acquitted Williams and Watson of all but one of the 15 felony counts they faced.

That, by the way, may make the defendants extremely lucky, but it doesn't make them heroes. Who are the heroes? One is Denny himself, the truck driver beaten mercilessly for the sin of being a white man within reach of angry blacks and who might be forgiven for being permanently bitter. Instead, he is asking only for racial healing, to let the nightmare end.

And then there are the four black people who risked their lives to rescue Denny from his attackers, climbing into his truck driving him away from the riot scene. Bobby Green, a truck driver; Terri Barnett, a clerk; Tish Murphy, an out-of-work engineer; and Lei Yullie, a nutritionist, are true heroes.

And I'll bet you they are more representative of black America than are the thugs they rescued Denny from.

G'Night, Sweetheart, It's Time To Go

As I sit in my office for the final time as Editor in Chief I am reminded of Van Halem's "Happy Trails" cover from the Diver Down album.

It has been a good time, but it has come to an end. Effective with this issue, I will no longer be associated with The Seahawk in an editorial capacity.

If you don't want to read any rambles, skip down to The Good Times.

The Bad Times

One of the most frustrating aspects of this job has been trying to spark conversation, discussion and debate about issues. Maybe I didn't go about it the right way, but I think part of the problem lies in the attitudes of most UNCW students. Many editors I wrote were written to spark a little controversy. For instance, anyone who thinks I really believe that the only weapon an American should be allowed to maintain in his home is a vintage 1770s musket hasn't been reading this paper for very long.

My intention was to create a forum for discussion. Instead, two writers said I should basically crawl back under my rock and stay there. One even told me I should create a forum for discussion rather than uttering ridiculous statements. Gee, I thought that was what I was doing.

One writer recently said that my editorial about NYPD Blue showed that I didn't have as much compassion for my fellow man as he did because I stated the show should be aired. He used the argument that the show was porn and violence glorified and a person like Ted Bundy admitted that this sort of influence caused him to rape and kill.

Now, I'm not going to support a Ted Bundy but there are stories out too that say Bundy admitted to this theory only because he was about to be executed.

The writer is a leader of a religious organization here on campus. Should I hold him in the same light as David Koresh, Jim Jones, Jim Bakker, Jimmy Swaggart, the Popes of the Crusades, and any other religious leader who had frauded, killed, or in any other way done unchristian acts? No, I don't think so. Then why should he be held in the same light as a Ted Bundy?

The Good Times

Enough venting. I will miss some of the people I met through my position here. They are too numerous to name, so I will thank you for your help, understanding, and patience when I see you, except for you three ladies in the Student Affairs Office (LEAVE ME ALONE!!!!!!!).

My fondest memory has to be the issue dated April 1, 1993. There are still people mad at me for that issue. Ha Ha Ha. I planned that issue for four months. I even left out an article about vampire cockroaches. They are carnivorous roaches that travel in swarms and attack when hungry. They get the name vampire because they will attack mammals as well as insects. See they came to Wilmington on a banana boat from Central America and the crate they were in broke during unloading and are now roaming free in the Wilmington area.

Don't think it would have worked? Every story in that issue worked on someone. Some people fell for more than one. President Clinton coming, the battleship being recommissioned, graduation outside, the Braves and Red Sox at Brooks Field, James Taylor at Trask, Coach Eastman resigning, oh the memories.

My next career move (if you could call it that) will be on the air this Saturday. The Danger Zone with Dick Danger and The Zone Patrol will be on Saturday from 7 - 10 p.m. on WAAV, 980 AM. It is a sort of Saturday Night Live for the radio. If you aren't doing anything that night, check it out.

I will still write for the paper, as long as the new editor will let me.

I know I have become frustrated by the paper because I want to do other things and I think that frustration showed. I really believe the paper, and in turn, the students of UNCW will be better served if I stepped down. Maybe new blood in the EIC position will improve the paper, I hope so.

These last two issues has had News Editor Amy Brennan at the helm and she has done a great job. I hope the Student Media Board takes her in as the new Editor in Chief. She is capable, knowledgeable, and talented. If there is a better candidate for the job, that person hasn't worked on the paper. I think commitment plays a big role in this job and she has shown hers.

Again, thanks to all who have made this experience worthwhile. I may not agree with all of you, but that is life. It has been fun, more so at one time or another, but I enjoyed it. It's time for me to move on. I thank you.

Friends Raping Friends

WASHINGTON—"My grandmothers lived in a world of manures, hair salon, and no place to go in the mornings." That felicitous first sentence is the fuse that lights Katie Roiphe's bombshell of a book in which she argues that a perversion of feminism is reviving stereotypes that constricted her grandmother's world.

In today's victimization sweepstakes, many prizes, including media attention and therapeutic preferences from government, go to those who succeed at being seen as vulnerable and suffering. So hell hath no fury like that directed against someone like Roiphe, who casts a cool eye on the claims and logic of some women who consider their victimhood compounded by any calm analysis of their claims. This Roiphe provides in "The Morning After: Sex, Fear and Feminism on Campus." It is giving some feminists the vapors.

Roiphe, 25, a Ph.D. candidate in English at Princeton, dissects the contemporary feminist obsession with sexual harassment and rape, both broadly—very broadly—defined. Behind this obsession Roiphe detects the old image of woman as exquisitely delicate, "with her pure intentions and her wide eyes," constantly on the verge of victimization.

Into what Roiphe calls "the normal libidinous jostle of coeducation" has come a gothic feminism. It portrays men as predators and women as prey—women who by nature are innocent, passive manipulable and almost asexual and whose fragile composure crumbles when they encounter male sexuality.

This feminism explains a feature of contemporary campus life, the "Take Back the Night" marches. At these rituals, the "survivors" of sexual "violence," very broadly defined, "speak out" about their voicelessness. They describe being "silenced" by a shadowy force with several names—"men's" or, for the intellectually upscale, "patriarchal hegemony" and "phallicism."

As Roiphe dryly notes, being "silenced" is and experience of the articulate, whose tone is often self-congratulatory: I have survived victimization, so I am very brave. Participants in these marches as thereby, says Roiphe, are "more over saturated with self-esteem than with cholesterol."

Today, when certified victim groups surely aggregate to at least 200 percent of the nation's population, one often-repeated statistic of suffering is that one in four college women is a victim of rape or interesting flaws. Seventy-three percent of the women categorized as rape victims did not themselves define their experiences as rape. Some feminists say that just proves how much those women need their consciousnesses "raised."

But at Berkeley, with 14,000 female students, only two rapes were reported to the police in 1990. And Roiphe considers it remarkable that she supposedly lives amidst an epidemic, with 25 percent of her peers encountering rapists, yet she never noticed it. "Somebody," she says, "is 'finding' this rape crisis, and finding it for a reason."

They find it by postulating that women are trapped in a "rape culture" where they are powerless and hence true sexual consent is problematic, perhaps impossible. The chorus about the ubiquity of "date rape" or "acquaintance rape" generates a limit of constant fear that Roiphe says sequesters feminism "in the teary province of trauma and crisis." In the process, the brutal crime of rape is trivialized.

Pamphlets titled "Is Dating Dangerous?" and "Friends Raping Friends" warn freshmen women to "be your guard with every man." Such literature expresses what Roiphe calls "the old sugar and spice" approach to female character. "It infantilizes women, portraying them as helpless before the onslaught of insatiable male desire."

"We've come a long way," writes Roiphe, "and now it seems we are going back." In its portrayal of female competence, character and free will,

"rape crisis feminism" echoes an 1848 book warning young women about verbally adroit men who will "dazzle and bewilder her mind" using "a subtlety almost beyond the power of her detection."

The preoccupation of rape crisis feminists with explicit, verbal, step-by-step consent to everything sexual—anything less supposedly is rape—rests, Roiphe says, on antique assumptions about the way men and women experience sex. Men are supposedly lascivious; women are innocents who, like children, have trouble ascertaining or communicating their desires.

One pamphlet defines a rape to include "a woman's consenting to unwanted sexual activity because of a man's verbal arguments not including verbal threats of force." By means of "verbal coercion," cunning rakes (the language of Victorian melodramas scent natural here) turn the pretty little heads of weak-willed women. No wonder feminists who think like this are so smitten what that quintessential contemporary victims, the woman who's story was so uncannily or perhaps cannily congruent with this latest fashion in feminism, the woman who herself said she passively followed her supposed sexual harasser from one job another: Anita Hill.

The Quilt: Keeping the Love Alive

On Monday morning of this week I stood in a room filled with ghosts. I stood in the middle of an empty Trask Coliseum at the beginning of my day and I could still see the panel hung around the bleachers and covering the floor along with people walking quietly along the pathways, some standing still staring at one panel, another kneeling on the panel available for participants to write messages and another wiping their eyes with Kleenex. As glad as I was to have this project over, I still felt a certain sense of mourning not only for lives lost to the disease of AIDS but for a group of new friends with whom I worked almost a year to help bring The NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt Display to Wilmington. On this Monday in Trask I could also still see the nineteen panels that were brought in during closing ceremonies from this area to be added into the some 26,000 panels that make up the whole Quilt. They remind me that people are still dying and will continue to die of AIDS. By ironic coincidence, my grade daughter finished a book report on Sunday about Camus' The Plague. AIDS certainly is a contemporary plague that knows no boundaries and, for which, we have no solution. The Quilt will continue to grow.

Then my memories moved me beyond the sense of tragedy to remember all the deeply personal expressions of love and affirmation expressed on various panels in the Quilt, panels which, more often than not, were brightly colored and bespoke a certain measure of joy and an abundant measure of love. Indeed if there was any feeling dominant during the four days of the display, they were feelings of love and compassion. The Quilt panels moved us beyond statistics to encounter persons who were loved.

The panels became our teachers as well. One panel bore the following insight: "Since God made us in God's own image, we are not human beings on a spiritual journey but spiritual beings on a human journey." That put a new spin on my own theology which I am only beginning to mull over and savor. I wish I knew who to thank for that thought.

As well as being testimonies of love, there were panels which also cried out for justice. On one Gay Vietnam Veteran panel there was written: "They gave him a medal for killing two men and a discharge for loving one." Once again our homophobic attitudes are challenged by a voice who is not only victimized by a disease but by values that dehumanized him and his sense of worth.

Still, in the quietness of Monday morning the overriding aim of the memories is one of love, a room full of love. The Quilt has been packed up and is gone. I do not want to forget. More importantly, we must remember that we are surrounded by people still alive who are living with HIV/AIDS and who need more than our love and compassion. They need support and care so while the Cape Fear Host Committee is grateful for all the help and support it received to bring the Quilt to Wilmington, it is equally, if not more grateful that we are close to reaching our goal raising dollar for dollar of money needed for expenses and money to remain in the community to support persons who are living with HIV/AIDS.

Trask Coliseum stands empty but the love remains and the love continues.

The History of the Citibank Classic Visa card and the Age of Credit Card Security.

In the 67th year of the 20th Century A.D., Citibank introduced a credit card aptly titled the Citibank Classic Visa® card. Established on the premise that a credit card should offer—24 hours a day—warm, personal service, the Citibank Classic Visa card marked the end of the Ice Age. And it ushered in a new era. ¶ With the introduction of the first Photocard, the credit card

This tablet, dated 1358 B.C., was the first known attempt to put one's photo on a credit card—but not without drawbacks. Photography had not yet been invented. It weighed over 30 pounds. And it did not fit easily into a wallet.

bearing one's own photo and signature on the front, it soon became evident that Man was entering the Post Paleolithic Period. First, Man was no longer looking like a Neanderthal, as one often does on more primitive cards such as the Student ID. He or she could now choose his or her own photo. Second, by deterring other anthropoids from using the card, Man was helping to prevent fraud. Surely this was a sign of advanced intelligence. ¶ The subsequent rise of services was nothing less than an American Revolution. So as you might expect, Citibank would be there for you, even if your card was stolen, or perhaps lost. The Lost Wallet™ Service could have a new card in your hands usually within 24 hours. (You can almost hear Paul Revere crying, "The card is coming! The card is coming!") ¶ When the Great Student Depression came along, Citibank introduced New Deals—special student discounts and savings. Hence, today's student can enjoy a $20 Airfare Discount for domestic flights¹ (ushering in the Jet Age); savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, magazines and music; a low variable interest rate of 15.4%²; and, no annual fee. ¶ Finally, comes the day you enter the Classical Age (i.e. when you charge your purchases on the Citibank Classic card). You receive Citibank Price Protection to assure you of the best prices. Just see the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150³. You receive Buyers Security™, to cover

Had Napoleon carried a Citibank Classic Visa card with its Lost Wallet Service, he would not have been compelled to hold on so obstinately to the wallet inside his jacket.

those purchases against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase³. And Citibank Lifetime Warranty™, to extend the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years⁴. Together they give you complete coverage; and with everything else...the Age of Credit Card Security. ¶ It's credit history in the making. With the help of Citibank's services and savings, you earn some of the credentials needed later on to purchase a car or even a house. ¶ So call to apply. Students don't need a job or a cosigner. Call, also, if you'd like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. The number is 1-800-CITIBANK (1-800-248-4226), extension 19. ¶ If after reading this chapter describing the prosperous conditions set forth by a Citibank Classic Visa card, one feels that he or she has left forever the Dark Ages and has entered upon a new age, the Age of Enlightenment, then your time, as they say, has come. Destiny is calling. And so should you.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Monarch Notes® Version:

With the Citibank Classic Visa card, you can build a credit history before you reach your middle ages. And, receive special student discounts. Call today 1-800-CITIBANK (1-800-248-4226), extension 19.

¹Offer expires 6/30/94. Minimum ticket purchase price is $100. Rebates are for Citibank student cardmembers on tickets issued by 15F Flights only. The Annual Percentage Rate for purchases is 15.4% as of 8/93 and may vary quarterly. The Annual Percentage Rate for cash advances is 19.8%. If a finance charge is imposed, the minimum is $10 cents. Batticus in the Atticus

By Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

Creeping stealthily up the ladder into the attic in my head, I am confronted with an oppressive heat and the smell of dust and stale air. This is where I keep the demons and the ghosts of my past. They are bound in an oaken chest covered by a quilt that hides over in the corner. They call to me, they beckon me back to them this time of year. When the gathering of the spirits occur and I am feeling mad.

As I open the box, I am confronted with all those things that I have not the strength to combat. I find that also included in this box of memories are a few misplaced items. Like this yellowed clipping of the TUNNELVISION shows that I meant to give a while back. It says "TUNNELVISION is a good band. They give a powerful mix of searing guitar and base melodies. The lead singer, John, alternates between seeming possession by demons and jokes to the crowd between sets. You should go see these guys next time they play."

I also find pictures of a mutilated body. A woman with her intestines strewn from her torso. A macabre picture from the Haunted House at Poplar Grove this weekend. Things to scare you silly.

When the witches gather around and the Christians are burning people at the stake, the smell of burning flesh will fill the air. One may wonder when the small minded people took it upon themselves to become judges of others. How did they get to choose what everyone else could believe? How do others get to choose what is appropriate for you to see or read?

I find a small box and, upon opening it, find that it is filled with maniacal laughter. This laughter quickly fills the air and reverberates off the attic walls. It is overwhelming and I clutch my hands to my ears to keep it from driving me insane. I do not know how much more of this I can take?

I am suddenly sinking into a rat of seething evil. I scream but no one hears me and I know that I am soon to perish. The darkness is creeping upon me and I can fight it off no more. I let it envelop me and begin laughing to myself in the same laughter that echoes throughout the room. "I am evil!" I bellow into the blackness. I am on my way out the door, licking my lips and thirsting for blood. You can not keep me away from your heart.

Wayward Thoughts to The Wind

By Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

I find myself searching for a certain kind of spirituality lately and running into all forms of trouble. Whenever you confront someone with obvious lunacy that we live with everyday, it often tends to shake them up just a little bit. People don't like to hear that all is for naught and that they are mindlessly following in the footsteps of their parents and their parents before them.

We are all just cogs in a wheel that is spinning, careening through space like a giant carousel that is controlled by demons and we keep reaching for that brass ring to win our prize but it is always and inescapably just out of our reach. You would think that eventually we would notice the carrot in front of our faces never gets any closer to our mouths, but we don't.

So here we all are stuck in death throes of mediocrity never realizing that we gave into them and their plan for all of us a long time ago or even that the us is part of the problem. We are supposed to be the ones that the system works for but it only half works for us and look at all those other mindless drones on the highway in front of you, what do you think about their chances for happiness? What do you think about your own.

Escapism is the theme of the day and it's no wonder the government is losing the war on drugs. Is it really that hard to imagine why someone would

The Connell's Are Back - With Ring!

By Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

Some bands will always sound basically the same from album to album. AC/DC, Metallica, Mudhoney, Primus - to name a few. The Connells, from Raleigh, also fit into this category. Sure, there were differences in the general mood, as well as aspects such as production, between the first four Connells' albums, but fans knew exactly what to expect. In fact, their previous outing, One Simple Word was downright boring for that particular reason. Would things change?

After a three year hiatus, the Connells are back with their fifth album, entitled Ring. The first things I noticed was the awesome picture on the front cover. But that's pretty irrelevant since no one sane spends twelve bucks on just a n album cover.

Ring is kicked off in an upbeat fashion with "Slackjawed", which is also the first single and video. It is catchy and memorable in the same way "Stone Cold Yesterday" was. In fact, most of the songs on Ring are as jingly and irresistible as anything on Fun and Games, the Connells' poppiest recording.

"74-75" is a great, atmospheric number reminiscent of something off the Boylan Heights. "Spiral" is an exquisite, dreamy piece, and probably my favorite song on the album.

One thing that is notable on Ring is the Connells' improved musicianship. Not that they were ever bad. It's just that they've never sounded better. Ring was slickly produced by Lou Giordano, who also has the latest.

Sugar and Dillon Fence albums to his credit. This was a wise move, as Giordano's production job not only sounds crisp and clear, but makes the band sounds more confident.

The Connells have been on the verge of hitting the big time for quite awhile now, and Ring could very well provide the boost they need to reach stardom.

A much better album than One Simple Word, and improving upon the best aspects of Boylan Heights and Fun and Games, Ring isn't really different than anything the Connells have ever done before. Just better. As Doug MacMillan sings on "Disappointed" - "If I disappointed you, I'm so sorry." Don't worry, you didn't.

Life At Seahawk High

ATTENTION FRESHMEN and SOPHOMORES: If you anticipate needing a transcript sent out anytime during your Senior year, then you had better go ahead and request it now.

This probably is not the best timing in the world for this issue, considering the fact that I will soon be registering for my last semester of classes here at Seahawk High. But what the heck, they'll probably screw it up about as bad as they always have. Welcome to this week's edition of "Let's Roast the Registrar's Office."

Travel with me (I feel like Mr. Roger's but we're not traveling to any land of make believe) back to September 30, 1993. That was the day that I mailed my application to medical school, and the SAME day that I requested my transcript sent. Here is how the last part of the conversation went.

ME: Will this go out tomorrow?

PERSON TAKING MY TWO BUCKS: Yes, it will be mailed tomorrow.

Now travel with me to two weeks from then (these are undoubtedly the two weeks it actually took to a.) punch in my ID number b.) Print the transcript c.) address the transcript and d.) mail the transcript. Anyhow, I got a letter from the medical school dated Oct. 14 telling me that my transcript had not been received. The registrar's office claimed it was mailed on Oct. 5, an entire week later than it should have been. Friends, I can mail a letter to Zimunda in under nine days (I could have hand delivered it to East Carolina in nine days).

Finally, the medical school notified me that the transcript was received on October 18, which was twenty days after I requested it to be sent. When I asked to speak to the registrar about the matter, I was told "He's busy for the next two weeks, (perhaps he's doing another transcript) why don't you come back then." I'm wanting to know why my transcript was so late that it almost voided my Medical School application and they say come back in two weeks. I guess that figures. If I were two hours late with my tuition, they'd cancel my classes. I guess that figures. I wonder what would happen if the Cashier's office were two weeks late with the paychecks. You figure.

In local news, the UNCW Interfraternity Council hosted the semesterly pledge talent show in Kanan Auditorium. Considering the uproar from "provocative" skits last year, I thought I would go and check this out. There were no really questionable skits this time (unless you include the Sig-Ep Fall Fashion Underwear Extravaganza) but I'm sure some ignorant youngsters somewhere will undoubtedly try to copy cat the skits in the middle of a busy highway somewhere and pressure from the FCC will prevent us from ever having another pledge talent show. I believe Delta-something-or-other won first place among fraternities with their portrayal of an unused cut from A Few Good Men.

In national news, scientists at Georgetown University announced that they have successfully cloned a human embryo. Holy Jurassic Park, Batman, that's scary!! Now the thing you are surely asking yourself must be "Can we bring back Elvis?" (Sorry Dr. Dodd) I do worry about this cloning business because there are some people I think the world can only stand one of (Elvis not included).

In other news, I have noticed that we are constantly bombarded in this world with absolutely ridiculous things. Take for instance consumer product labels and pamphlets. I got a "troubleshooting guide" from Vision Cable the other day. Listed as the #1 thing to check for when your cable is out was "41. — Check to see if television set is turned on." On a bottle of deodorant I found "Warning: not for consumption." Gee, I guess I will have to eat shaving cream for breakfast today since my deodorant is not to be eaten. My favorite of these is found on the box that a hair dryer came in. I can full well understand the "Do not use while asleep" warning. Narcoleptics beware!!

This week's HAT'S OFF award goes to Director of University Relations, Mimi Cunningham. Mrs. Cunningham is evidently a faithful Semi-Coherent reader because she faxed in my last column to WGNI radio DJ and recent HAT'S OFF awardee Craig Thomas, who read a portion of it on the air. It was good for me and the University. HAT'S Off to Mrs. Cunningham for getting us some airtime.

The SHOE'S OFF award this week goes to (guess who) the UNCW Registrar's Office. Not only did they delay my transcript without explanation, but the registrar doesn't even have time to offer an explanation. If the UNCW Telephone Directory lists ten employees in the Registrar's office, then someone should be able to get student's transcripts out on time. But then again, it was only medical school at stake. Shoe's Off to the Registrar and associates.

Well I guess that's enough (maybe too much) for this week. As always, your comments, concerns and cash donations are always welcome. Address them to me in care of The Seahawk. Don't forget to set your clocks forward (or is it back?) and to VOTE YES ON TUESDAY. Until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

free-standing location would be necessary later.

Feiner said, pending Senate approval of the station, he hopes the first phase of programming would be off the ground by spring.

"The ultimate end of this project is to create a real campus community, something the students can feel a part of. That's the reason for media. Media serves to unite groups of people together by a common understanding of what's going on, instead of lots of diversion in thought and lack of understanding. That's what I envision this doing."

This story is the first in a series about the proposed television station at UNCW.

June Oravits

Get Outta My Way

Do you cruse the campus parking lots entertaining thoughts of beating the hell out of the jerk who just dive-bombed into a slot you waited 40 minutes for? The parking situation on campus has gotten so out of hand many students (myself included) could ace a course in Imaginative Murder 101.

During my "class-time" in the parking lots at UNCW I've managed to pass the oral exam for a self-initiated class called How to Out-Cuss a Seaside Sailor. It only took the first week of this semester to complete the requirements for this class and I passed with honors!

In the UNCW administration aware it's fostering potential murderers? Does the administration know these murders will probably take place in our campus parking lots? Threats, near-miss collisions, and arguments occur on a daily basis. It doesn't matter if you're a part-time or full-time, traditional student or non-trad. I've heard horror stories from all kinds of students. These are normally mild-mannered people confused, aggravated, and exasperated with this parking problem. UNCW is fertile grounds for Stephen King to do some major research for a novel. Finding a parking space and living to tell the tale is becoming a nightmare.

UNCW is growing and the parking problem will grow. This same vicious nightmare seems to be a never-ending story for all college campuses. But I'm not trying to park at other campuses, I'm trying to park here at UNCW. So give me a damn space!

While daydreaming about the most creative way to torture that girl driving the gray car with surf racks who almost rammed into me and then screamed insane suggestions on what I could do with various parts of my body, I did manage to come up with some ideas I believe would help the whole campus.

First, start towing away parking violators. I paid the bloody $80 "luxury tax" for the privilege of cruising the parking lots. For my money I would like to actually park my car. I have no pity for the creeps who take up spaces with their non-stickered vehicles and collect expensive parking tickets. These same jerks seem to think that since they're getting the ticket anyway they may as well hold up the space for the rest of the day. Either the police ought to give them hourly tickets or tow the suckers away. I'm just as insolent as you idiots are, but I paid the damn parking fee.

Finding a parking spot has certainly taken the edge off any semblance of common sense or courtesy I might have had upon first entering UNCW. Now it's every woman for herself as far as I'm concerned. I've been cursed, threatened, intimidated, and sacred to death just driving on campus. It doesn't matter that I've waited 40 minutes for a parking space, when one finally opens up some jerk dive-bombs around me and zooms into MY long-awaited space. I guess I shouldn't complain too much, at least they gave a signal—by flipping me the bird on their little jaunt around me.

My big proposal is to build a parking deck where the faculty parking lot is at Morton. Where else do we have to except up? For this humongous faculty, some of the existing parking lot that feeds the Science and Behavior building could be utilized. Access to this parking deck could be from Price Drive as well and form the existing entrance off Randall—Crews Drive.

There are a number of benefits this parking deck would create. First, a centralized facility offering many parking spaces for a number of campus buildings. Smaller feeder parking lots could be maintained for campus visitors.

Secondly, a computerized gate at the entrance could be operated with a faculty or student ID card. Your paid parking fee would validate your card and permit your use of the parking deck. This procedure is used at many employee parking facilities nationwide, it should work for us.

Another benefit I envision is enabling traffic leaving the parking deck to choose an exit either onto Price Drive or Crews Drive. The Crews exit should consist of two lanes: one lane allowing traffic to turn left onto Randall and the Other lane for traffic turning right or going straight on Crews. A traffic light at this intersection would resolve the present traffic flow problem and the traffic the parking deck would create.

Now, I'm not an engineer nor am I an administrator concerned about funding this venture. I realize there are a number of logistical details that would have to be explored in considering my imaginary parking deck. But, duh, we're a university, surely we can figure it out. The whole point is we're having trouble with traffic and parking now, just what do you think the future's going to bring?

Until something is done, we're going to continue to have problems with finding space and maintaining some control over our tempers. All I can offer is some ideas for resolving the situation and a warning—get outta my way!

UNCW Gets New Acting Professor

BY PAULA NEILL
Public Relations Student Volunteer

WILMINGTON—The University of North Carolina at Wilmington has a new addition to the Fine Arts Department. Dr. Renee Vincent, assistant drama professor, hopes to bring new insight into the cultural art field.

Vincent, most recently from Bedford, TX, specialized in acting, directing and movement for the actor. She received her Ph.D. in directing at Bowling Green State University, OH, and also holds a MFA in professional acting and a BFA in dance performance from Southern Methodist University. She also holds union cards with Screen Actors Guild, American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, and Actors Equity Association. In addition to educational background, she brings extensive experience to the position. She has directed and choreographed such plays as On Golden Pond, Little Shop of Horrors, Cinderella, The Birds, and You're a Good Man Charlie Brown. She has had professional acting roles in plays such as Night of the Arts which was performed at the John F. Kennedy Performing Arts Center in Washington, D.C., and Lou Ann Hampton Lavyer Oberlander performed with the NC Arts Council Tour. Her film and television experience includes Fire on the Mountain, Brainstorm, and Halloween.

Vincent heard about UNCW through Art Search, an organization designed to help arts professionals find jobs. She had visited the Carolinas before and thought she might like it here. She likes UNCW's big "little" school atmosphere—large enough to have diversity but small enough to give each student individual attention. She feels very inspired, cared for, and at home at UNCW and has aspirations for the drama department. Some of her long-range ideas are to establish a relationship with the NC Film Studio and possibly bring in well-known actors to work with the students. Her short-term goals are to lay down a solid foundation for performance and technical programs.

One thing she is excited about is helping prepared a UNCW team for the American College Theatre Festival in which colleges from around the nation perform plays competitively. This year Fly Wright, a musical done by UNCW's Frank P. Trimble will be used by UNCW in the competition.

This is the second time a UNCW drama group has participated. This production will be competing Nov. 11-14 in Salisbury. Vincent feels that this will promote the school, as well as give the students exposure to other college's styles of plays and performing strategies.

UNCW Women's Lacross Team Beats ASU

BY SHANNON SMITH

New to UNCW club sports this fall is Women's Lacrosse. Victory prevailed this past Saturday in Boone for the club with a score of 5 - 4 over ASU. Leading scorer of the game was freshman Evan Whitley with 5 goals and assists were made by freshmen Wendy Reid, Janine McClellan, and junior Anne Jaeger. Junior Kelly Santrock made numerous saves in the goal to keep ASU from scoring.

Although the women's team is new and inexperienced, they proved that hard work and practice truly pays off. The Lady Seahawks will continue to practice and look forward to the rest of the year. A special thanks and congratulations goes to Buddha and the men's team for their continued enthusiasm and support during the game.

UNCW SMOKES THE MOUNTAINKERS

The UNCW Men's Lacrosse Team traveled to ASU this past weekend for their first game of the season. A strong defense led by goal tender Bryan Steiner, and a high powered offense led by Shonobee defeated ASU 8-3. This victory marks a new era in the UNCW Lacrosse program.

WOMEN'S LACROSSE

New to UNCW club sports this fall is Women's Lacrosse. Victory prevailed this past Saturday in Boone for the club with a score of 5-4 over ASU. Leading scorer of the game was freshman Eryn Whitley with 5 goals and assists were made by freshman Wendy Reid, Janine McCollette and junior Ann Isinger. Junior Kelly Santrock made numerous saves in the game to keep ASU from scoring.

Although the women's team is new and inexperienced, they proved that hard work and practice truly pays off. The Lady Seahawks will continue to practice and look forward to the rest of the year. A special thanks and congratulations goes to Buddha and the men's team for their continued enthusiasm and support during the game.

SEAWEED ULTIMATE UPDATE

By SUSAN TURNER
Ultimate Writer

We did it!!! We qualified for Club Nationals. Seaweed took a team of 17 women up to Titusville Park, PA to compete at the Mid-Atlantic Club Regional Ultimate Frisbee Tournament. 10 women's teams participated at the tournament including: (listed in order of rankings going into the tournament) Sonori (DC), Philly Peppers (Philly), Grits (Raleigh, NC), Seaweed (here), Carpe Disc (DC), Janna (NY), V Not (NC), Banabees (Maryland), Venus (PA), and Princeton (NJ). Usually only 2 teams would qualify for Nationals. However, our region received a wildcard in the women's division (a wildcard is awarded to the region with the most number of teams. Participating at Club Nationals: Mid-Atlantic and Central Regions tied, so they had to actually count the numbers of players. We had 15 more players in our region, so we received the wildcard.) Meaning 3 women's teams would make it to Club Nationals from our Mid-Atlantic Region. With that in mind, Seaweed went out with a vengeance for that #3 spot. In fact, we went out to determine that we ended up finishing #2!!!!

After about 2 hours of sleep (long road trip to teammate's house in NJ), Seaweed made their way on the field on a gorgeous Saturday Morning. The tournament was broken up into 2 pools of 5, so we played all of the teams in our pool on Saturday. We defeated: Banabees 13-2, Venus 13-0, and Carpe 13-4. Our last game of the day was against the almighty Sonori who took us down 13-7.

Sunday's play started out with quarter finals. We crushed Janna 15-5 and went on to our Semifinal Game. Here we met our long lost rivals. Philly Peppers (also known as Zephyrus), whom we have never beaten before. 2 years ago we came up against them at Club Regionals in a scramble for 2nd place (that season only 2 teams make it to Nationals). They went to Nationals while we stayed at home. Well, this year we rose above the wicked wishes of the East and shut them down 17-13. Yahoo!! San Antonio here we come! Next we had to play Sonori in the finals to see who placed #1. Sonori maintained their glory. Philly Peppers and Grits (each of semi's) battled it out for #3 spot. Philly finished #3.

New Seaweed are anxiously making plans to head out to San Antonio, TX Nov. 11-14. Yes, the first time in the history of Seaweed ultimate to make it to Club Nationals!!!!

The World Series is over and that means one thing - baseball's business season begins. This (faster than a speeding bullet) Nixon announced Monday that he would be jumping on the Free Agency Wagon along with other notable players such as Will Clark and Andres Galanaga (I hear Andres signed). I'm not exactly sure how I feel about all this. I can understand wanting to leave because your scraping by and can't afford to pay your rent, but come on the Braves offered Nixon 2.5 million. If that's not enough money what is? I'm pretty sure that Nixon is paying all his bills and his car is probably running just fine - I don't think he needs the money, nor do I think that any of the other top players need the money. Sometimes it seems like the only thing that motivates talent (in any sport) is greed. I'm not pointing fingers (Kendall Gill) but some names come to mind.

While awaiting next Monday's pairings for the Colonial Athletic Association Championship, Coach Keith Carmidge's team is keeping its focus on one of the club's primary goals this fall - having a winning season.

The Seahawks, who went 1-1 last week, need one victory in the final two regular season games to secure the program's first winning season in five years. A win would also give UNCW its highest victory total in 13 seasons since the 1980 squad went 14-2.

In action last week, junior forward Joel Myers fashioned a hat trick as the Seahawks rolled past Pembroke State, 5-1, at Brooks Field on Tuesday. Then, over the weekend, the Seahawks ran into a surging Winthrop team that posted a 4-1 decision over the Seahawks.

UNCW returned to the pitch this Wednesday with a 3 p.m. date against visiting Methodist. It was the final home appearance for senior Paul Cincery, a four-year starter from Clydehook, Scotland. Following the matchup with the Monarchs, the Seahawks close out the regular season slate with a 1 p.m. matchup Sunday at Appalachian State in Boone, NC.

The Colonial Athletic Association Soccer Championship runs Nov. 4-7 at Richmond. Seeds and pairings will be announced on Monday, Nov. 1.

VOLLEYBALL

UNCW Wilmington's volleyball team went 1-2 last week, defeating Coastal Carolina (15-7, 15-2, 15-8) before dropping a pair of the Colonial Athletic Association matches at George Mason (15-2, 15-2, 15-9) and American (10-15, 15-4, 15-8, 15-12).

The Lady Seahawks, now 13-11 overall and 0-2 on the conference, begin a four-game homestand this week with matches against William and Mary on Friday (7 p.m.) and James Madison on Saturday (1 p.m.). UNCW owns a perfect 15-0 lifetime record vs. Campbell. The Seahawks are 6-9 vs. James Madison and winless at 0-5 against William and Mary.

Statistically, seniors Amy Chinsky and Bobbi Pace continue to lead the UNCW players. Chinsky owns a .287 kill percentage with 97 blocks. Patsky has a team-best 299 digs.

Ginger Moon is enjoying a solid freshman season as the team's setter. She leads the team in assists (844) and service aces (55) on (ECU) def. Kramet/Ashmore (UNCW), 6-1, 6-0.

SWIMMING
By SHANNON MCBRIDE
Sports Writer

The UNCW swim team is once again ready to dive into action. Coach Allen is looking forward to a successful season with the largest team UNCW has had.

The main difference between this year and last, Allen said, is the increase in both numbers and talent. Top newcomers to the Seahawk program include freshman Christel Smith, Pamela Deason, Amanda Moore, Darci Daggett and diver Tricia Patterson.

Coach Allen feels these girls "will be able to step in and contribute right away with depth and quality performance."

Allen said he will be looking for "leadership and positive examples" from seniors Cameron King, Deb Kresh, Shannon McBride and Tonya Marshall.

The men, with an equally large team, will also be stronger this year. They've gained junior transfers Greg Warren and Jason Tanner who will provide the team with depth and experience, and also freshmen Chris Guastello, Doug Stanok, Bob Hoppes and Jason Paris.

Coach Allen feels that the men's team, headed by seniors Mark Ruggiero and Clinton Perkins, will be more versatile than last year.

The swim teams first meet will be this Saturday against Old Dominion in the Seahawk Natsaturn at 2 p.m.

Although ODU has undergone coaching changes and problems with their facility, Coach Allen doesn't want to "underestimate or overlook" this team.

Even though the meet shouldn't pose a problem to the Seahawks, Allen said, "We have to perform well no matter who the competition is."

He is looking to better both teams dual meet records and also finish higher in the CAA Championships. Allen would like to see the men win the conference, or at least repeat their second place finish. The women, who finished 5th last year, should place in the top three this year.

Allen said that the team is handling everything well so far, despite their large number. He is excited about their first meet, saying the "competition brings us away because they can now see where the training goes."

The main thing this year's team must do, according to Allen, is to perform at a higher level than last year. Allen has been pleased with the spectacular turnout saying, "UNCW has always supported us very well," and plans to reward them with victories.

Coach Allen and the swim team encourage students and faculty to come watch a meet. The competitive atmosphere is exciting even if you don't know much about the sport. Give it a chance, and join the Seahawks for the first meet this Saturday. Remember...if you can't be an athlete, be an athletic supporter.

Discover Center

The Discover Outdoor Center's last trip of the semester is a canoe camping trip on the Cape Fear River. It will take place November 5-6. The cost of the trip is $30 for a student and $35 for faculty and staff. This price includes transportation, canoeing gear, and all the camping gear.

On November 13th, the Discover Outdoor Center is offering a UNCW community day on the Challenge Course. The cost of this event will be $12 per person.

Anyone interested in these activities needs to contact the Discover Outdoor Center at 350-4052 or come by the office in Room 138 of the University Center.

PAINTBALL!!

By ERIK TOTTEN
Sports Editor

Splat! That's what I heard almost all day Sunday when I traveled to Jacksonville to try the latest craze in the new - Paintball. I went with the idea of writing this article but I have to admit, I had a blast.

My group showed up at about 9:00 a.m. There to say it but I think we were all a little bit intimidated. Upon arrival the first thing we all saw were two marines dressed completely in camo gear looking two guns that looked like they came out of "Terminator" or something. As if that wasn't bad enough the first thing we had to do was sign a waiver that pretty much said if we happened to DIE from injuries they weren't responsible. At this point I thought watching might be a safer alternative than to risk dying by Paintball history.

My courage, however, did return when I was given my very own Paintball Cannon, whopie - I mean gun. Just holding it in my hands and being able to threaten people made me feel better, despite the fact that compared to the guns the marines had I was holding a water pistol.

After a few practice shots we were ready to begin. The first game was called Speedball which is basically designed to make you feel comfortable blowing your friends away. After the first game we went from game to game - from "Capture the Flag" to "Defend" to "Elimination" and everything in between.

The playing field consists of a huge wooden field - there are some rough paths cut through the woods but you might as well shoot yourself if you decide to wander around on the paths because everybody else will. There are also some first aid kits that provide some coverage and usually protect the flag. Everybody was fired up and the morning seemed to fly by.

Around noon we took a lunch break of hotdogs and iced tea which was provided for us by the group that ran it. After that we were all ready for more. We played some more of the same games but let me tell you - there was nothing similar in the action. The games are different every time and that keeps you on your toes constantly. I was pulverized a number of times (like when I got up to run and got shot 9 times simultaneously. I still feel it) but I also did my share of pulverizing. There was one time in particular that I snuck up behind one of the "bad guys" and got within about 10 feet of him when he decided to charge the first. He took about two steps and then I shot him a couple times in the eye - well you know where I mean. By about 3:30 everybody was relatively ready to go. A great time was had by everybody involved and my strongest recommendation go out to anybody that may be interested.

From what I found when comparing prices it is one of the more affordable options in the area. The cost was $25 and that included the equipment rental and lunch. You were also given 100 paintballs free but had to buy the rest after that. Other than that the only negative thing is the thirty minute drive. But hey $25 for a whole day of that kind of excitement is well worth it.

Anybody interested can contact the Campus Paintball representative who is Jeff Treggs, 395-5496 or call B&B Adventure Games Ltd. at 598-3264.

If I had to rate Paintball - I'd give it an A+. Go out and try it - I promise you, you'll enjoy it.

Senior Athlete Profile

BU JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Todd Pascarella is one of the two seniors this year on the UNCW Men's Soccer Team. This mid-fielder, born in Pittsburgh and now from Raleigh, is a major in Business Management and will graduate in the Fall of 1994.

Todd was introduced to soccer when he was six years old. At this time he was living in Florida across from the Fort Lauderdale Strikers, a professional soccer team, and played with one of the member's (Manny Cabbis) son's around the neighborhood. "It seemed like everyone played soccer in Florida," Todd states. At ten years of age, Todd moved to Greensboro where he began to play soccer in high school. In his senior year he came down to look at UNCW, who Jeff Johnson (presently assistant coach for the Seahawks and graduated from the same high school) recommended UNCW. Todd immediately fell in love with the school and the team. "I like the way the university is spread out and modern, along with the beach nearby. The team was very personable and everyone seemed cool. I also liked the idea of playing soccer in nice weather all season," Todd remarks. As a result, Todd chose to attend UNCW, and he was given a scholarship to play soccer.

Playing soccer for UNCW has kept Todd busy. He loves playing soccer because it makes him happy. "It helps me to compete and to give me a sense of responsibility," adds Todd. Teammates usually look at Todd as the leader-type; he works hard and takes pride in getting everyone "pumped-up" for the games. Part of his desire to do this in his last year at UNCW was because of the fact when he was an underclassman he always looked up to the seniors for inspiration and leadership, and Todd just wants to return the favor in his final season. As an outcome of being a member of the UNCW Soccer Team, Todd has developed a better touch on the ball and it has made him a better passer. "I also have a decent shot, but it makes me much happier to see someone else up to score," comments Todd.

Todd would like to see a lot more people come out to the soccer games, especially since the World Cup will be coming here this summer. "We need the whole community involved not only the students, which Keith (the head coach for UNCW Soccer Team) is trying to get that incorporated with the Cape Fear Soccer Association," Todd states. He also feels that if more people attend the soccer games, the more the team will get "fired-up" and motivated to win. Todd has very realistic goals for his final season with the Seahawks. He comments, "I think we will do well considering our past three years and come out with a winning season." The team is working really hard and hopes to put forth great effort in the conference tournament. Todd's personal goal is to stay well and healthy, so he can continue to play the sport he loves.

Todd was voted Most Improved Player his freshman year for the UNCW Men's Soccer Team. He has also helped out with the UNCW Soccer Camp in the summer along with the Cape Fear Youth Soccer Association Camps.

"I want to stick with soccer as long as I can, because it is something I enjoy doing," comments Todd about his future plans and expectations. He hopes to coach his own team someday, working his way up to the collegiate level of coaching. Todd likes teaching and coaching and is good working with people. Todd has a desire to start his own travel team after he graduates. He also wants to try-out for the Raleigh Flyers, a semi-professional soccer team. As far as his intended future career goals go, Todd plans to follow in his father's footsteps and go into the car dealership business. He believes it would be a good idea to take advantage of the opportunity sitting in front of him, which his father has set a solid foundation for. Plus, Todd knows a lot about the business since he grew up with it his entire life that he would find it to be foolish not to grab this unbeatable chance.

Throughout his four years playing soccer for UNCW, Todd has encountered many influential people. Three of his fellow teammates have made a major impact on Todd and his performance. "Paul Cairney always works hard and is a great guy; I look up to him because he never gives up. Ken Lentz pushes me to work hard, and he works hard himself. Jeff Johnson (former player, now assistant coach) pushes me to work harder and keep going. I can confide in all of them and take their constructive criticism," reflects Todd about his friends. This year Coach Keith Carmidge has also developed Todd as a soccer player. "He has broadened my game which has made it easier on me, and he is driving me to work harder. He also gives me ideas in practice how to push the team and drive them to do better to prepare me for coaching soccer," Todd comments.

Todd's parents are his #1 fans. His mother knows the game fairly well and always cheers him on and supports his endeavors. Todd's father has always been his inspiration to do well, and he goes to every soccer game no matter where it is. Todd states, "I always look for him at my games. He tells me what I am doing and how I am playing - he coaches me." Knowing his father's support means a great deal to him, Todd feels more secure when he sees his father at the game.

UNC Sea Grant Program Awards UNCW Professor

BY LYNN BENSON
Staff Writer

UNCW researcher Dr. Kimon T. Bird, marine biotechnology program coordinator for the Center for Marine Science Research at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, has been awarded a $240,000 grant for a three-year study on seagrass propagation. The grant will fund Bird's proposal titled, Development of In Vitro Propagation Technologies for Marine Seagrasses for Use in Habitat Restoration and Genetic Characterization of Seagrass Populations.

Restoring seagrass beds, are important because, as Bird explains, "They provide nurseries for baby fish and scallops. Commercial fish spend part of their lives in seagrass beds. We will study ways to propagate seagrasses to create and restore seagrass beds through genetic propagation."

The research will focus on developing propagation technologies for marine plants used in habitat restoration. "Specifically, we'll be using some biotechnology methods. We'll be developing systems to grow marine plants in test tubes, and we will be testing how well these plants do when they are put back out in the field," said Bird.

The process of looking at seagrasses using detailed genetic information is similar to using DNA fingerprinting for identification purposes, says Bird. It will help identify what kind or variety of seagrasses work best for restoration purposes.

The Florida Department of Natural Resources and the National Marine Fisheries Service in Beaufort, NC will also cooperate in the project. UNCW will supply plants for them to test and those organizations, in turn, will send plants to UNCW for testing and analysis.

The grant is administered by the NC Sea Grant Program.

Voters Approve Bond Package

BY AMY BRENNAN
Editor in Chief

All four of the bond referendums on North Carolina's $740 million bond package were approved by voters on Tuesday despite low turn-out.

The referendum for university improvements received 53 percent approval. Community colleges received 57 percent. Clean water bonds drew 59 percent, and park bonds were favored by 56 percent of the voters.

UNCW Chancellor James Leutze was excited about the approval of the university improvement referendum, but expressed disappointment over the results from the region. In New Hanover county, the bond issue for the college system was the least popular. Voters in Bladen, Duplin and Onslow counties rejected all four bond issues. Pender County narrowly voted against the university issue and passed the community college issue.

"We need to do a better job of informing everybody in this region of what the university is trying to do," Leutze said.

The bond package was the largest ever put before voters. As a result of the package being passed, state universities will receive $310 million for improvements, community colleges will receive $250 million, $145 million goes to clean water projects, and state parks receive $35 million.

UNCW will use its share of the money to build a new science building and add a new wing to Bear Hall. Improvements will also be made to DeLoach Hall.

The bonds are not expected to raise taxes. The money used to fund construction will provide a major stimulus to N.C.'s economy. The projects will generate an average of 230 jobs per year and $13.2 million in payroll for New Hanover, Brunswick, Columbus, and Pender Counties.

In addition, interest rates are low. According to the U.S. Bureau of the Census, N.C.'s net long-term debt per capita is $134 as compared to a national state average of $506 and a Southeastern state average of $391. State Treasurer Harlan Boyles has also said that is the state does not address capital construction backlog, the state's excellent bond rating will be jeopardized.

Polls before the election showed that the university bond referendum would be a close vote. Leutze said he was concerned particularly with the bad local publicity about the community colleges.

"I felt we had to stand arm-in-arm with the community colleges," Leutze said. "Some people didn't think that was the thing to do. But it's an educational issue, and it involved the community colleges as well as the universities."

In addition to passing the bond packages, voters rejected the constitutional amendment which would free government from having to seek voter approval before issuing bonds to entice industry to the state.

Hepatitis B: A virus that is 100 times more contagious than HIV, the virus that causes AIDS and is prevalent among college-age adults.

Hepatitis B is not commonly thought of as a sexually transmitted disease although it should be since it is spread through sex, just as AIDS, syphilis, herpes, and gonorrhea. It is a highly contagious virus, and if left untreated, can be fatal. The virus is contracted through blood, bodily fluids, and sexual contact. Thus, if you are sexually active with more than one partner in six months, engage in unprotected sex, or have had another sexually transmitted disease, you are at high risk.

College students are at highest risk of infection since 75% of all hepatitis B cases are young adults between the ages of 15 and 39. Since Hepatitis B can be spread through intercourse as well as other types of sexual activity, condoms may not always prevent infection.

However, Hepatitis B is not a disease that only strikes those who are sexually active. Since it is highly contagious, anyone can get Hepatitis B. In addition to blood, bodily fluids, and sexual contact, the virus can be contracted through contaminated needles and from an infected mother to her child through birth.

Many people with Hepatitis B mistake the symptoms for those of the flu. Some of the symptoms of Hepatitis B are: fatigue, nausea, skin rashes and arthritis, jaundice including yellowing of the eyes and skin, vomiting, abdominal pain and loss of appetite. Often the debilitating symptoms of Hepatitis B can be so severe that those infected are unable to attend school or work for months.

There are many people who do not even know they have Hepatitis B because they have no symptoms. These "silent carriers" unknowingly pass the virus on to countless others. Approximately one out of ten people infected will develop chronic active hepatitis B which often progresses into a deadly liver disease. Statistics from the U.S. Center for Disease Control and Prevention indicate that 14 people die each day from Hepatitis B-related cirrhosis and liver cancer.

Hepatitis B is the only STD preventable through vaccination. Manufactured using DNA technology, Hepatitis B vaccine prevents the transmission of the virus. The vaccine is given in a series of three simple shots over a period of six months.

By stimulating your body to fight off the Hepatitis B virus, the vaccine protects from infection even if exposed to the virus. To get the vaccine, contact your doctor or call 1-800-HEP-B-873 for referral to doctor near you.

The nationwide Hepatitis B campus prevention program is sponsored by the American College Health Association. UNCW director of student health, Kathleen Jewell, MD, has received comprehensive educational materials from ACHA to help establish a program that will teach students about Hepatitis B and its prevention.

How Safe is "Safe Sex?"

BY MELANIE HURLEY
Staff Writer

Dr. Steven Sainsbury of San Luis Obispo, California, recently published an article in the Los Angeles Times contending that condoms don't make sex safe. He does not like the fact that condoms are "outed as the solution to HIV transmission." He pointed to two facts to back up his argument. First, he said that a 1989 survey of college women showed that "only 41% insisted on condom use." He also said that "condoms fail frequently due to improper storage, handling, and usage. The breakage rate during vaginal intercourse is 14%." He said that "for condoms to be the answer to AIDS, they must be used every time, and they can never break or leak. The only answer is no sex until one is ready to commit to a monogamous relationship." Dr. Sainsbury quoted an infectious disease expert, Dr. Robert C. Noble of the University of Kentucky, "We should stop kidding ourselves. There is no safe sex. If the condom breaks, you may die."

Deborah Hayward, the assistant director for health promotions at UNCW said that she "basically agrees" with many of the things that Dr. Sainsbury said. She said that "there is no such thing as safe sex, but some sex is safer than others. Using condoms correctly, consistently, and having one partner" is okay for those choosing to have sexual relationships. She said the "choice to have intimacy without intercourse does not mean there is no physical intimacy or closeness." She said the bottom line is "knowing your own values," whether those values are abstinence, monogamy, or sexual relationships.

The Anatomy of the Citibank Classic card: a body of services and peace of mind for students.

For years, scientists could only theorize about the Citibank Classic Visa® card, unable to actually observe anything below its epidermal surface (i.e. the plastic). Surely, the highly intelligent services were evidence of an advanced brain. But with the latest advances in x-ray technology, and when the light could catch the various parts just so, it was confirmed: the Citibank Classic Visa card is head to toe more evolved than ever imagined. ¶ At its backbone are 3 services to cover the purchases you make on the card. Starting at the Lower Costal Spine, we see Citibank Price Protection can assure you of the best price. All you have to do is discover the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150! Along the Ooops-It-

Scientists theorize that the mind of the Citibank Classic Visa cardmember (Fig. A) is secure because it receives superior service; the mind of the non-Citibank Classic Visa cardmember (Fig. B) is not secure because—could it be—it has a screw loose?

Slipped Disc, Buyers Security™ can cover those purchases against accidental damage, fire or theft, for 90 days from the date of purchase¹; and Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ allows one to extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years². So if you ever buy a walkman, a stereo, whatever, it will be reassuring to know that Citibank can bend and be flexible while still lending support.

¶ The backbone is then connected to the cranium or headbone. You can actually see it on the top left hand corner of the card. Look at the bottom of the page. The Citibank Photocard has the head of the cardholder on it, as well as his or her own signature, right on the front. That way, it will help prevent fraud. It will make a good form of ID as well, since you get to choose your own photo. ¶ But what about the Nervous System? The fact is, it doesn't have one, not in the spinal cord nor in the brain. What it has is the Very Calm System. Because even if your credit card gets stolen, or gets lost, an involuntary muscle called the Extendus Anewcardeus activates the Lost Wallet™ Service which can replace your card usually within 24 hours. ¶ As suspected, there's another involuntary muscle: the heart—a beating and caring heart, big enough to give students special discounts and savings. You'll receive a $20 Airfare Discount on domestic flights³; savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, magazines and music; a low variable interest rate of 15.4%⁴; and, no annual fee. (In other words, the card itself doesn't cost a forelimb and a hindlimb.) ¶ Naturally the heart of the Citibank Visa card pumps life and personalized customer service into all its parts, 24 hours a day. So no matter what the question you might have concerning your card, you need only call the 800 number. Citibank representatives each have a neck they are eager to stick out for you. They will always lend an ear. Or a hand. They will keep an eye out for you. They will put their best foot forward. Etc. ¶ So call to apply. You don't need a job or a cosigner. And call if you'd like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. The number is 1-800-CITIBANK (1-800-248-4226), extension 19. ¶ If we take an overview of the whole body of services that make up the Citibank Classic Visa card, and consider that it will facilitate building a credit history, then you must shake a leg, flex your index finger and call today.

Monarch Notes® Version:

With your purchases covered, no fee, and a low rate, the Citibank Classic Visa card will go easy on your Nervous System. Call 1-800-CITIBANK (1-800-248-4226), extension 19.

Being Present to the Moment

Now, today, in this place, at this moment; here is where some of the greatest riches of life are to be found. So often our lives are focused on tomorrow, on tomorrow's exams and papers or parties or lists of things that need to be done. Or, our attention gets focused to other direction, on our past, where we may find left over bad feelings, chores unfinished, relationship matters unsettled or even wonderful weekend memories that I find hard to let go.

In any case, whether it is a focus on the past or future, the net effect is to distract our attention from the present moment. Every new day is a gift and hidden within it are all sorts of little gems, little miracles. Judith Knowlton writes, "Miracles are unexpected joys, surprising coincidences, unexplainable experiences, astonishing beauties... absolutely anything that happens in the course of my day except that at this moment I am able to recognize its special value." I had a lecture to give at 8:00 this morning and was so caught up in getting to the office to get ready, that I almost missed a wonderful moment outside of my house where I stopped and felt the wonderful crispness of the morning air and bright blueness of this November 1 fall day. Now I am aware of it, energy has bubbled up and I am filled with the joy of the awareness of this simple crisp day.

We are constantly surrounded by miracles as defined by Judith Knowlton. Serendipitous surround us but our present moments are simply too often contaminated by past issues and future agendas. Our culture scripts us this way so that our life has so much agenda that we miss what is happening in the here and now. The issue to which I invite your attention is whether you are able to recognize the special value of given moments and little experiences of your life. These miracles are never far from us. The problem is that we are absent from them. There is beauty all around you. Are you aware of it? An encounter with a friend can be enriching if you allow yourself a moment to simply appreciate them for who they are. A good meal can be enriched by the simple appreciation for those who have grown the food and the wonder of its abundance in our lives as so many do without. A new idea or insight in a class can be savored and enjoyed as we walk to another class with its own opportunities to gain yet more insight and understanding.

Even in tough times, the present can be enriched. Author Leo Buschella tells a story about his mother and "misty dinner." It was the night after his father came home and said it looked as if he would have to go into bankruptcy because his partner had absconded with their firm's funds. His mother went out and sold some jewelry to buy food for a sumptuous feast. Other members of the family scolded her for it. But she told them "the time for joy is now, when we need it most, not next week." Her courageous act rallied the family. She understood the need of the present moment and by doing so she affected their future. I invite you to reclaim your awareness of what is doing on here and now, today.

As we do, we begin to notice "the extra ordinariness of the ordinary." We can expand the pleasure and meaning of so much in our daily lives simply by attending to it which then folds over into appreciating it. I hope that you will discover the riches hidden in today.

Making An Assault on Pornography

WASHINGTON—Catherine MacKinnon, author of "Only Words" and campaigner in the culture wars on campuses, is more than just another full-time victim, ubiquitous and loud in proclaiming that she has been silenced. This professor at the University of Michigan law school also is a leader of the most radical assault on free speech in American history.

McCarthyism, the "red scare" after the First World War, and the Alien and Sedition Acts were the products of political factions with familiar kinds of interests and passions. But today's assault on free speech is launched by intellectuals citing the core values of contemporary liberalism—compassion, fairness and equality.

Like all monomaniacs, MacKinnon believes in One Huge Fact. Hers is: We live "in a world made by pornography"—although she does not acknowledge it — for censorship of much more as well.

One argument is that pornography is not "only words" (or only pictures), it is a form of assault, causing violence against women and reducing them to mere commodities. So government should treat pornography as action to be regulated, not expression protected by the First Amendment.

Her second argument is that free speech is, for most people, a chimera in sexist, racist America, where most people are members of "subordinate groups." Pornography, a tool of male domination, must be censored to promote the constitutional value of equality.

Her argument sweeps far beyond pornography. Government has not only a right but a constitutional duty to suppress all expression that exacerbates any "historically oppressed" group's subordinate status. MacKinnon says that pornography and all other expression that imposes ("constructs") is the preferred jargon) subordination really silences groups, so such expression is itself really a form of censorship, and censorship of it is really an expansion of freedom.

According to the theory behind the proliferation of campus speech codes, there is this new entitlement: the right of certain groups not to have their sensibilities hurt. So censorship is progressive when it suppresses expression that offends subordinate groups. Such groups include almost everyone except white heterosexual males, Jews (interesting, that) and perhaps Asian-Americans.

Free speech must wait until all groups achieve equal status. When MacKinnon says, "Society is made of words, whose meanings the powerful control, or try to," she rationalizes something familiar: Despotism—government control of words—made virtuous by the goal of equality.

Although she bases her case for despotism on an empirical claim (about pornography's power to impel behavior), she shows scant interest in evidence. However, Judge Richard Posner, reviewing "Only Words" in The New Republic, notes some evidence. Denmark, where pornography is completely unregulated, and Japan, where pornography featuring rape and bondage is especially popular, have rates of rape far lower than here; the rate of rape has been declining as pornography has proliferated; women's status tends to be lower where, as in Islamic nations, pornography is suppressed.

The point is not that pornography is harmless. It contributes to the coarsening of American life and so conduces to social crudeness, perhaps violence. But the First Amendment is a nullity if it protects only expression what is without consequences, or that consequences universally considered benign.

And even if pornography were proven inconsequential regarding violent behavior, MacKinnon and like-minded feminists would still want it censored as part of a government program to impose on society a progressive "consciousness." Furthermore, the logic of her position leads to censorship of all depictions, in popular culture or advertising, of women in "subordinate" roles.

For someone who so strenuously loathes American society, which she says is defined by pornography, MacKinnon is remarkably eager to vest in this society's representative government vast powers to regulate expression. She simply ignores the familiar contradiction in radical programs for therapy, what reason is there to trust the government produced by that society to be therapeutic?

MacKinnon reasons serenely, as fanatics do, within a closed circle of logic: If you do not see our wicked society as she does, that just proves how wickedly society has "constructed" your false consciousness. Thus all critics are dismissible.

This professor, made rich and famous by a tenured position at a prestigious public university, proclaims her voicelessness in a volume published by the Harvard University Press. Here is the final sign of fanaticism—no sense of the ridiculous.

William Rasberry

Lowering the Crime Rate in America

WASHINGTON—The stiffer sentences and mandatory minimum prison terms of recent years were supposed to reduce crime and make us feel safer. What they have done is to fill our prisons to the point where we are letting unreformed inmates out the back door in order to make room for the newly convicted. Our jails and prisons are full, our budgets strained to the breaking—and our streets as unsafe as they've ever been.

So here comes the Clinton administration with a crime bill that will—what else?—provide stiffer sentences: including longer terms, limitations on appeal rights, easier transfer of juvenile suspects to adult courts and greatly expanded recourse to the death penalty.

The proposal calls to mind the homespun wisdom I've heard repeated several times this year: If you find yourself in a hole and you're wondering what to do about it, the first thing to do is stop digging. The administration bill and a Republican alternative both fail to grasp what should, by now, be obvious: We can't punish our way out of our crime problem, and that efforts to do so amount to trying to dig our way out of a hole.

The people who propose these things are not stupid. They just keep learning the wrong thing. What they learn is that for many offenses—and many offenders—enhanced punishment does work. Put a few overcharging cabdrivers in jail, and overcharging will be greatly diminished. Hike the charge for overtime parking from $3 to $25, and we'll keep a closer eye on our watches.

But for some offenses—notably crimes of passion and crimes of despair—severity of sentence is of little consequence. American's middle class understand crimes of passion. Thus we are not surprised to learn that doubling the minimum sentence for manslaughter is likely to leave the manslaughter rate unchanged.

We don't understand crimes of despair. We don't begin to understand that the threat of jail, or of an enhanced prison term, doesn't mean much to a youngster who is convinced that (a) he won't get caught, (b) he could get lucky and beat the system and (c) his life was headed nowhere to begin with. And yet, because we ourselves respond to such threats, we keep imagining that the solution is to make the threats stronger: jail time instead of probation for the fledgling crook; mandatory terms for drug dealers (including those who deal primarily to supply their own addictions); longer and more certain terms for violent offenders and, as the administration bill proposes, a broader schedule of crimes for which the penalty can be death.

Surely, we reason, the threat of death must deter.

Really? To what extent would it deter the gangbangers, who take it for granted that long life is not in the cards for them? Would a federally enacted death sentence deter the drug dealers for whom the threat of death—quickly meted out by a rival dealer, with no clemency or appeal—is a fact of daily life?

The ACLU has attached the crime bill, a huge chunk of which is a carry-over from legislation that failed last year, on the expected grounds: its racially biased application; its limitations on legal appeals (especially of capital cases) and its enhancement of sentences with no showing that longer sentences reduce crime.

My objections are closer to those voiced by Malcolm C. Young, executive director of the Washington-based Sentencing Project—principally that the legislation has nothing to do with crime prevention.

The crime that may lead a frightened American to take a chance on these flawed bills has its roots not in inadequate punishment but in unformed consciences. The rest of us may violate societal rules whose validity we accept. The youngsters we so fear are not backsliders from an accepted faith; they are social infidels. Our values are not their values, our expectations are not their expectations, our fears are not their fears.

None of this means that we shouldn't punish—even severely—those who violate the law. It means only that the problem—and any hope for solution—begins much, much earlier.

We need to undertake the painstaking work of promoting our values, our unquestioned hope for the future, our taken-for-granted belief in mutuality. We need to give our young people both hope and a conscience.

That takes attention and resources at the front end. The crime bill would make the principal investment at the back end—in the criminal justice system—where it's already too late.

And who can doubt that if this misguided approach becomes law and fails (as it must) the response will be a demand for still tougher punishment? As someone who person put it, one definition of insanity is to keep doing the same thing the same way and expect different results.

Maybe it's too much to expect a nation perfected by crime to do different things a different way—by undertaking serious prevention and, yes, redemption.

But can't we at least stop digging.

Evidence of Low Voter Turn-out can be seen at this Polling Place

The Bond Package Passed, No Thanks to 82 Percent of New Hanover County

On Tuesday, Nov. 2, the people of North Carolina had the opportunity to vote for a bond package worth $75 million. The money was divided into four separate referendums including one for university improvements, one for community colleges, one for clean water, and one for state parks. Voters also had the option to reject a constitutional amendment which would prevent the government from having to get voter approval before issuing bonds that would bring industry to the state.

Fortunately, all four of the referendums passed. The voter turn-out however was pitiful. Only 22 percent of registered voters and 18 percent of eligible voters turned out in New Hanover County. As Americans, we have the opportunity to vote on issues that will effect the way we live and work. This is a luxury that millions of people throughout the world do not have. The fact that 82 percent of the people who are eligible to vote in this county didn't bother to go to the polls is disgraceful. These same people undoubtedly complain about the way things are, just like the rest of us, but they refuse to do anything about it. If you can't even make it to the polls to express your opinion, don't open your mouth to express it. I don't want to hear about it! The constitutional amendment was rejected but it might as well have passed. The low voter turn-out is proof that most of North Carolina's citizens don't care whether they have a say in matters or not.

Almost as sad as the low voter turn-out, is the way people seem to think about education. Both the university improvement bond and the community college bond barely passed. University improvement received 53 percent of voters' support and community colleges received 57 percent. This country will spend billions of dollars every year for bombs and planes and other toys, but they aren't willing to educate their children. That makes sense to me!

On Monday, I was sitting behind a table set up in the cafeteria where students could call home FREE to encourage their parents to vote yes. I couldn't believe the number of people who declined the invitation. I already knew my parents were going to support the bond but I called anyway because I certainly can't afford to call them from my house on my salary! I think their mothers would be awfully disappointed if they knew little Sally and Johnny passed up an opportunity to chat, for FREE, for a minute.

Those free phone calls home were just one of many efforts put forth by the university to encourage voters to support the improvement bond. My congratulations and thanks to University Advancement, SGA, and everyone else who did their part to spread the word. Thanks to everyone who voted. I know I said I didn't want to hear from you if you didn't vote, but I lied. If you didn't vote, you need a good excuse. Write me a letter and tell me why. If you aren't from North Carolina, then I already know why you didn't vote - you are excused from letter writing. Also, don't bother to tell me you didn't vote because you didn't want taxes to be raised. If you had read anything the Seahawk had to say about the matter, you would know that the number of jobs that will be created because of the construction will alleviate the need to raise taxes.

Remember to include your name on your letter. If you're not big enough to tell me who you are, don't waste my time. I will print all appropriate letters. Send them to the Seahawk in the University Union, room 205.

Wagoner II: Wagoner's Revenge

By Todd Allred
Entertainment Writer

It's finally here. The second (and probably) final restaurant review of Wagoner Hall, UNCW's on-campus dining facility. Many of you may remember my first review, which ran in The Seahawk a couple of months ago. For those of you who cannot recall the article, it was slightly unfavorable and called downright "cynical" by the director of ARA Food Services.

I would have apologized for disturbing him and the others who bust their asses daily at Wagoner to bring us our meals. The only problem is I'm not sorry. There were simply too many things that needed improvement and what better way to bring them to ARA's attention than to write up a little review. Right?

Well, it must have done some good, because immediately following the publication of the article, several changes were made. First of all, somebody greased up the previously jammed roll drawers with WD-40. A small repair, but noticeable to everyone who had spent their dinner hours fighting to get it open, including me. Another minor detail that I pointed out in the review was the fact that you had to get the choice of hot chicken or gravy in another line. Now, choice is available upon request in any line.

I criticized the lack of variety of the food being served, and since then, I've noticed that several new entrees have surfaced from time to time. Changes like these may seem small and easy to fix, but it makes a world of difference to us, the students, who have to eat there all the time. Having noticed these and other changes, I decided to give Wagoner Hall another chance and write a follow-up review. Now, the truth....

During the month of October, there were several "special events" held in Wagoner Hall, including an "Oktoberfest" celebration emphasizing German cuisine, a pizza eating contest, and perhaps most surprising, a steak and shrimp night.

First of all, I would like to say that having these events is a great idea since it gives us something new and different to look forward to when we go there and eat. And, I believe we'd all like to see more of these events. I was unable to attend the pizza eating competition, but did make it to the Oktoberfest celebration and the steak and shrimp night. I would like to briefly comment on both.

I must admit I was pretty disappointed with Oktoberfest. The "German" food prepared for that special occasion included Bratwurst, but looked and tasted exactly like the giant medicine flavored wiener served they serve all the time. The Wierschschmizel was just gristly, breaded pork cutlets with a different name. And, I don't know and don't want to know what the Sauerbraten(?) was. The steak and shrimp night is a different story.

On this particular night, we were given tickets to trade in for our choice of ribeye steak, shrimp, or chicken breast fillets. I chose the steak, and although I would hesitate to call it a ribeye, I found it quite enjoyable. After I finished the steak, I went back up to the line to try some of the shrimp. Unfortunately, I couldn't have any shrimp, because we only got one ticket. One. Now I know this was a special event, but if this was called steak and shrimp night, then damn it, I want to try steak and shrimp! The server politely assured me I COULD have some pasta shells, however. Great. Anyway, I left without sampling the shrimp and must therefore rename the event "Steak OR Shrimp night." The food was great, but the attitude was stingy. They shouldn't be stingy with over seven hundred dollars from each and every on-campus student.

On the normal days, when we CAN eat (or attempt to eat) more than one entree, things are slightly improved, but overall pretty much the same. For every delicious slice of cheesecake, there is a hair in the Chicken A La King. For every new, hot and tasty entree, there are five cold, disgusting, trays full of leftover chicken. Which brings me to what I wish to point out.

Leftovers. That's all we seem to get anymore. For example, and this is just one day out of many, today, November 1st, they served sausage and apples as well as shrimp fried rice for lunch. And, they served sausage and apples (where did they get the blockheaded idea to serve sausage and apples together, anyway?) and shrimp fried rice for dinner. Enough is enough. If I didn't want it for lunch, that does NOT mean I want it for dinner. Understood?

And, no one I know wants to eat chicken four or five days straight, even if it is fried one day, then baked the next, then fried again, then covered with some malodorous gravy, and finally jerked. By the way, what EXACTLY is jerked chicken? I'm not sure I want to know. Is it the same as choked chicken? If so, I know I don't want it! While I'm pointing out things that could use some improvement, let me mention a few complaints I've heard from other various people. Bones in fish fillets. Watery pasta sauce. Brown, decaying lettuce that should be raked out of the salad bar and into piles with all the other falling leaves. Coffee that tastes like dishwasher. Feathers in the chicken. Apples with multiple wormholes. Strawberry cake seven days straight. Green peppers in everything. The list goes on, and it all adds up to dissatisfaction and, occasionally, Wagoner's Revenge. Get the idea?

I am pleased to announce that there are several positive things to say about Wagoner Hall.

For one, they recently added a section against the back wall called "The Wokery," three nights a week, where we can stir fry our OWN food. This is a particularly good thing for vegetarians, since there is no meat. Anyhow, the vegetables are fresh and you have a choice of three or four sauces to cook your food in. Also, with the exception of the ones that sit out all week, the desserts are good. Especially the cheesecake. Breakfast is almost always the best meal of the day, partly because you can get fresh, delicious, made-to-order omelets. The honey glazed chicken breast fillets they served on Halloween were a nice surprise, and we can now wash our food down with, yes, root beer.

For all of these aspects, Wagoner Hall and the people who work there should be commended. They also have a highly visible comment board and drop box where they take your suggestions, complaints, or compliments. Even if you don't have anything to say, you might want to read some of the comments as they are often very entertaining.

I closed out the first review with a couple of wacky events that have happened in Wagoner Hall's brief past, including the now infamous story of the hallucinogenic enchilada casserole as well as the mysterious affliction known as "Wagoner's Revenge." I will now enlighten you with the Athletic Banquet Incident.

One day, as the story goes, the Wagoner people held a special banquet for the track team at the Madeleine Suite of Wagoner Hall. A complete, several course meal was planned and set up. Everything seemed to be going fine, but something was wrong. Very wrong. You see, chicken, with some sort of sauce or gravy was being served on that particular afternoon, along with an assortment of vegetables, etc.

Just as one guy was about to dig into the chicken, he noticed one thing the chef didn't notice. The chicken was raw. They forgot to cook the chicken. Luckily, no one ate it. Also, there is something being served in Wagoner Hall that is commonly being referred to as "The Rock." It has a couple of different menu names, perhaps even disguised in a few different ways. But it's still there. The Rock. At least once a week. See if you can figure out what it is, but by God, don't eat it!

Wagoner Hall has improved in some areas. They've even added new attractions, such as "The Wokery," and events, such as Steak OR Shrimp night. But at heart it's still the same 'ol Wagoner Hall that we've all come to know and love. The food still leaves A LOT to be desired, but some of the changes that have been made lead me to believe that things may be headed in the right direction. This time, I'll give it an over all grade of C-. That's higher than my previous grade, but until "Changing Scenes" actually changes that's as high as it's going to get!

Liquid Movements, Solid Objects

By Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

I would like to welcome all of our guests to this week's installment of frantic ramblings. As many of you may have noticed last week, I touched on the banality of our existence and also offered up some holiday cheer for you spooky kooky college students. This week's article will be of the same erratic nature as previous attempts.

I hope you don't understand a word of it.

During the past week, I have had ample opportunity to further expand my mind as well as my liver by experiencing a wide variety of entertainment avenues.

On Tuesday of last week, ACE started up a new venture here on campus, a coffee house of sorts. The night began with Student Body President Ziggy Nix reading some poetry and a short humorous essay that was about taking a shit. After this brilliant inroduction into the surreal, guitarist Roger Manning played songs to the assembled crowd. I like that ACE is trying to do here. You should check it out, if not for the intellectual stimulation that might actually occur in your gray matter, but for the wonderful chocolate chip cookies that were free.

On Thursday night of last week, Hootie and The Blowfish once again headlined a show at The Mad Monk. I know I have mentioned them before, but they are a really good band and I like them and I am writing this article, and you are not, so there. Go see them. It will be worth your time and effort.

On Saturday night, Johnny Quest and Egypt came to The Mad Monk for a Halloween bash. Egypt has been around for a while and the addition of a new vocalist seems to have propelled them back into the limelight. They are Funky with a capital F. Quest took the stage a little after the witching hour and proceeded to tear everyone in attendance a new buttohole. If you have never seen Quest, you are missing out. Needless to say, I have never been disappointed by their enthusiasm or their ability to stoke a crowd into a whirling swirling mass of teeth, hair, and eyes.

That's it for this week. I'm on my way out the door wishing I had a dollar in my pocket and a beer in my hand.

The Vocal Part of Wilmington Speaks Out

(WILMINGTON)—The debate over the bonds was furious the past week on Talk Radio WAAV. I don't know if you listened to the "experts" of Wilmington spout their views like anyone cared, but most callers were against UNCW.

These are probably the same people whose livelihood depends on the money UNCW students pour into the community.

Let's look at an actual transcript from Chris Watkins' show Monday morning.

CALLER: I don't think that there University should be asking for no more money. They get money from tuition and they should be happy.

WATKINS: That's a good point. The school does get money from the students.

LEUTZE: It is important to remember that no improvements have been made on campus in over five years and the increase in enrollment has caused classes to become overly crowded. It is difficult to learn in an environment not conducive to learning.

WATKINS: That's a good point. The students need space to learn.

CALLER: How much money will it cost to run the air conditioner and heater for that building when it is completed? Where is that money going to come from?

WATKINS: That's a good point. That money has to come from somewhere.

LEUTZE: Well, the increase in students will mean an increase in tuition and some of that money will be used to pay for the maintenance of the building.

WATKINS: That's a good point. So, you've thought this through. Impressive.

CALLER: I do not think the bond should pass because I don't think the University does enough for the community. I know the incredible amount of money poured into the community keeps most area businesses afloat, but one kid once took a parking place from me at Wal-Mart, so I am anti-UNCW. This is a simple question. If A) the bond is approved, what will happen when 1) construction companies put up their bids will they A) have to be from the Wilmington area, B) provide workers who have valid green cards, and C) have to prove they achieved at least a 700 on the SAT or 23 on the ACT; 2) land clearing crews come in will they A) have to prove they have done this sort of thing before, B) provide their own machinery, and C) look for spotted owls that may have flown here to escape the fires on the west coast; 3) parking lot builders have to lay asphalt will they A) have to make sure the area is properly sloped to ensure drainage, B) have to use white lines for parking places, and C) have to place the drains at the low areas of the parking lot; and B) when is the first home mens' basketball game? I don't like the students but anytime I get a chance to take my kids to a game and teach them cool things to yell at the referees I do it.

I hope your bond fails miserably.

WATKINS: That's a good point. Uh... that last caller sounded like a former city or county official who lost his reelection bid. I guess he feels the community can still be bettered by the input of a man voted out of office. Interesting.

LEUTZE: I've asked for, but you can be sure the University will see to it that every dollar is spent properly. We have two state auditors working on campus that go over our books everyday to ensure that little money is wasted.

WATKINS: That's a good point. So, like, you have people who check all expenditures?

LEUTZE: Yes.

WATKINS: That's a good point.

CALLER: I don't want my taxes going up so you can put more snotty-nosed kids to school. The heck with this investing in our future crap, I like things just the way they are. The heck with growth, and learning, and being able to carry on a conversation, and knowing what your talking about. That's all a bunch of hooey.

WATKINS: That's a good point. People should learn to like things the way they are.

LEUTZE: What we are trying to do at UNCW is increase the knowledge pool and create an international reputation for the University. The increase in communication and business technology has created a global market. In order to compete with Asian, European, and other world markets, we are going to have to learn about tomorrow. And help create a niche for Wilmington and Southeast North Carolina in that market.

WATKINS: That's a good point. You mean like growing to accept the needs of the ever-increasing demands of tomorrow's job market? That is foresight. Wow!

CALLER: I were doing a 'livery the udder day and I seen an empty chair in a class room. How can you 'plain 'bout space when thars at least one seat open on campus?

WATKINS: That's a good point. If there is a seat open on campus, how can you ask for more space?

LEUTZE: Let's assume there was a seat open. Maybe that person was absent that day.

WATKINS: That's a good point. Sometimes people do get sick.

CALLER: How come ya'll don't offer night classes for us fokes whose gots day jobs? Some of us would like the 'tunity to go to college and earn a degree in litacher.

WATKINS: That's a good point. What about night classes?

LEUTZE: We do offer night classes.

WATKINS: That's a good point. You do offer night classes. I guess to find out about them the caller should make an effort to go over to the school and ask. Wow.

We are going to take a break right now and we will be back next hour with Beavis and Butt-head, two teenagers accused of tempting five-year olds to burn things. And you know what, they are cartoon characters. Imagine that, cartoons influencing people. I'll bet Bugs Bunny is too smart for these two. Jessica Rabbit did get into trouble but that's because she was drawn that way.

COMMERCIAL: Though this station has been broadcasting thousands of calls against the University we will still continue to broadcast the Kevin Eastman talk show on Thursday nights and will continue to be the flagship station of UNCW basketball. We make a lot of money in advertising from the University and will continue to do so in the future.

WAAV the station you can depend on to allow you to vent your illogical opinions.

Jim Clark can be heard every Saturday night from 7-10 p.m. on The Danger Zone on, you guessed it, WAAV 980 AM.

Financial Aid News

BY LISA PRICE
Staff Writer

New guidelines are making financial aid available to more students. Two new low-interest loan programs are being offered to any student willing to borrow.

Unsubsidized Stafford Loans are available to students ineligible for any other aid. Freshmen can borrow up to $2,625 and more for upperclassmen. Students have to pay interest at 6.22% while in school, no principal until they leave.

The rest of the cost can be covered by PLUS Loans at a rate 6.64%. Paperwork for both is available at the financial aid office.

New loans and more financial aid are undoubtedly needed after more than a 5% climb this year in the cost of tuition, room and board. Four-year private colleges went up 5.3%, four-year public colleges up 6.4%, and two-year public colleges had the highest increase of 10.1%.

Surfing With The Sharks

Do you remember writing essays on "How I spent my summer vacation" in elementary school? Well, I don't. Being an Army brat I attended 17 different schools before finally graduating from high school. Somehow I always missed this rite of passage at the beginning of each school year. But I'm going to make up for it now by sharing how I spent summer 1993. For an old broad like me, I think my summer was rather interesting.

I took surfing lessons at Wrightsville Beach—now that was fun, but weird. One morning I was watching my son surf (from a distance, he hates my proud mother act), and I decided, hey, I can do this. This would be a great adventure.

I marched myself down to the Wrightsville Beach Recreation office and signed up for lessons. When I showed up on the beach at the ungodly hour of 7 a.m. one morning, I found I was the only adult besides the instructor. The other surfing wannabe's were these little ten-year-old boys who wouldn't speak to me much less look at me.

In Summer Session I's Anthropology class, I thought I'd convinced a fellow student to join me in this new and exciting endeavor. Then I wouldn't have been so alone. Ginger, wherever you are, you let me down and look what you missed.

So there I was at my first lesson. Each "surfer" was assigned a buddy to conduct this little exercise called the Advanced Ocean Swimmer's Test. We had to swim out to the end of Oceanic Pier, tread water, then swim back to shore at the instructor's signal. You have to pass this test in order to continue the lessons. We were supposed to look out for our buddy during this exhibition of swimming skills. "Stay with your buddy," the instructor emphasized.

Well, my little buddy was a little slow. I slowed down and paced myself to his speed (I'm very good at following direction). He slowed down even more. I slowed down. Finally, I figured it out. The little creep wanted me to swim somewhere else—like maybe Australia with a thousand women-eating sharks.

The boys' mothers were much friendlier than their sons. After the first day of lessons when they saw me show up strutting my stuff down the beach, carrying my surf board, and generally looking cute and debonair, they started staying everyday to keep an eye on their boys. I'm sure it must have been because I was inspiring to watch.

Anyway, the boys would kind of bunch up together and leave me by myself way over on the other side of the instructor. Their mothers really had nothing to worry about. I was way too busy hitting myself in the head with my board and dumping my butt in the ocean and otherwise looking like a complete fool to draw. I'm positive my little heathen buddy wouldn't come anywhere near me. He'd probably giggle with every diminishing bubble the rose from my drowning lips.

I'm not going to tell you how my lessons turned out, I'll leave it to your imagination (hint—Surfer magazine isn't panting to do an interview with me). I did learn a number of useful little tidbits: waves come in sets of odd numbers, how to way a surfboard (although asking for Sex Wax in a surf shop embarrasses me to death), and the leash goes on your ankle, not your wrist.

I discovered another important piece of information the instructor didn't share with me. As you get older your center of gravity shifts—downwards! You have to learn to compensate for the old baboonzias when you're on a surfboard.

Despite the boys' silent treatment, I had a great time in the water. I caught just as many waves as those little brats did, so my surfing lessons weren't totally a comedy act. Anyway, I figure the little monsters were able to stand up easier than me because they're shorter and had less distance to travel.

The surfing lessons were great. A good portion of the rest of the summer was spent dragging my kids to the beach so I could go surfing (well, let's say practicing). I can't figure out why, but my kids weren't as enthralled with my new hobby as I was, they seemed to be more interested in hiking down to the other end of the beach instead of hanging out with me. I wonder if they're trying to tell me something. I mean, gosh, how many mothers do they know who have the Wrightsville Beach surfing lesson schedule posted on the fridge along with their school papers and grocery lists?

My next adventure is to learn how to shoot guns at the Sheriff's Department firing range. Do you suppose any little ten-year-old boys will be there? Hmmmm....

Internships: Minority Participation In Business and Government

BY PAMELA WARD
Staff Writer

There will be a great new opportunity for students to experience working in their field of study coming up in Spring 1994. The Cameron School of Business, Business Law 491, along with Dean Rockness and Dr. Robert Cutting have worked hard this semester to provide an intern program that is geared to the needs of minority students and women.

This program is designed to explore multi-cultural participation in both the private and public sectors. The long term objective is to prepare minority students and women to work effectively and move ahead in the work force.

Academic credit will be given and some internships may include stipends. The program is open to all majors, but it is listed under the course Business Law 491 because, it originated within this class.

Students who are interested are being asked to request and/or submit an application by Nov. 20 so they may be placed for the Spring semester.

The program has internships available right now and is growing steadily. In the government/legislative sectors, Senator Luther Jordan, Representatives Thomas Wright and Karen Gotzovi are all offering in ternships in policy research, economic development projects and services for district residents.

"The program has internships available right now and is growing steadily."

There are also available internships in real estate, mortuary and manufacturing businesses within the private sector. Legal Services of the Lower Cape Fear has internships assisting in areas of housing, health, law, domestic issues and general litigation.

The Fifth Judicial District Courtship with Judge Jacqueline Morris Goodson has agreed to participate in the program. Students will have the opportunity to see how the court system functions on a daily basis.

For students who are interested in any aspect of the media, the Challenger Newspaper is seeking qualified interns as well. In addition, radio internships will be available.

For more information on the program, please contact Robert Cutting, Business Law Professor of Cameron School of Business, at 395-3140. Application packages are available in the Department of Accountancy, Cameron School of Business. Keep in mind that this program is for all majors.

The deadline, once again, for applications to be considered as Spring interns is Wednesday, November 20, 1993.

Happy Students Wait To Register

Trask Diagnosed With Cancer

BY ELLEN E. EZZELL
Staff Writer

Raiford G. Trask, after whom Trask coliseum is named, was a vigorous developer of New Hanover County. Today he waits for his end. He approaches his situation with humor, yet his status is anything but humorous.

Diagnosed with terminal cancer two years ago, Trask is now thin and weak from the cancer that will soon take over his body. However, Trask is not resentful.

"I had 75 good years. Then the cancer came," Trask said.

UNCW would not be where it is today without the help of Trask, who sold and donated property to the college. In 1958, Trask sold Wilmington College 173 acres at $150 an acre to help develop the campus. Additional land purchases allowed the college to move to its present location, which was then uninhabited. He later donated ten more acres for the university to sell to help build a new gymnasium when Hanover Gym became too small.

Vital Named First Minority Vice Chancellor

University News Bureau

Dr. Michelle Howard-Vital joined UNCW as vice chancellor for Public Service and Extended Education on Oct. 26.

Howard-Vital is the first minority vice chancellor at the university.

Chancellor Leutze said: "She is a broadly capable individual who knows extension education from the academic side of the house as well as public relations and marketing. I'm delighted that she has chosen to join the administrative team at UNCW. Her experience in extended education will assist us in meeting our goal of serving the non-traditional educational needs of this area. We will also look to her to help us with our community development projects."

Howard-Vital previously served as associate vice president for academic programs and dean of university college at Edinboro University of Pennsylvania.

Her educational background includes a Bachelor of Arts degree in English Literature and Language, University of Chicago, 1974; Master of Arts in Teaching in English Literature and Language, University of Chicago, 1975; and the Doctor of Philosophy in Public Policy Analysis - Education, University of Illinois at Chicago, 1983.

Howard-Vital developed and implemented academic programs, policy, and curricula at Edinboro

University. She also monitored operational budgets for academic affairs, recruited and hired new faculty, and coordinated academic support activities. Academic support activities included tutoring, freshman orientation, and a program designed for students undecided on a major.

From 1986 to June 1991, Howard-Vital served as dean of continuing education and non-traditional programs at Chicago State University where she developed an educational television talk show program, "Learning Options," to expose cable viewers to learning opportunities.

"I'm very excited and enthusiastic about coming to UNCW," said Howard-Vital. "I've heard such really good things about the UNC system, particularly its strong innovation. I'm interested in being on the forefront of innovation, especially in distance learning."

"With my experience in non-traditional education, I feel I can blend very well the non-traditional community service with the academic affairs concerns for quality and integrity of instruction. I also feel very strongly that a university should be responsive to the needs of its community," she said.

Howard-Vital also serves as an associate professor in the School of Education, Department of Design and Management.

Time employees will now need to be tested for the HIV virus after a company doctor used needles more than once to administer flu shots last week. The doctor reportedly ran short of needles while giving the shots, so he wiped needles clean with alcohol again. The Centers for Disease Control has not approved this procedure, stating that alcohol does not effectively eliminate bacteria.

Michigan authorities hauled Jack Kevorkian off to jail Friday, after a judge ordered a $20,000 bond to stop him from violating a law against assisted suicide. Kevorkian refused to pay the bond and vowed a hunger strike. Kevorkian has been present at 19 deaths since 1990, and been charged twice for violating Michigan's law against assisted suicide. Michigan enacted the law only 8 months ago. Kevorkian previously evaded jail on the condition he not assist in more suicides, but two weeks ago police found a woman dead in Kevorkian's apartment. Kevorkian was released from jail Monday after an attorney paid $2000 bail.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan proposed a bill last week to impose heavy taxes on hollow point handgun ammunition. Moynihan proposed increasing the tax by up to 10,000 percent. For the average gun owner, the price of a box of 20 cartridges would skyrocket from $16 to as much as $1,600. The tax would not affect law enforcement agencies. Revenues from the tax would be used to help pay for President Clinton's health care plan. Doctors called hollow point bullets, which mushroom upon impact and cause wounds that can extend to vital organs, use most lethal ammunition.

Vice President Al Gore and Ross Perot batted heads over the North American Free Trade Agreement Tuesday night. Perot contended "you will hear the giant sucking sound" of Mexican jobs going to America if NAFTA becomes law. Gore accused Perot of playing "the politics of fear" after he displayed a photograph of slums surrounding a Mexican factory. Perot said low wages in Mexico would take thousands of jobs away from Americans. In 1991, American manufacturing wages averaged $15.45 per hour and Mexican wages averaged $2.17. Gore's statistics indicated the U.S. trade deficit with Mexico had gone from $5.7 billion in 1987 to a $5.2 billion surplus in 1992. If approved, NAFTA will eliminate tariffs and trade barriers between the United States, Mexico and Canada.

UNCW Is On The Rise and So Are Its Admissions

BY TREY CHEEK
Staff Writer

Standards for admission at UNCW have grown tougher in each of the past three years. The administration set a goal to raise the average SAT score of UNCW's freshmen class fifteen points in each of the next three years. Last August, the average SAT score for the UNCW freshman class was 940 and the average GPA was 3.1.

UNCW Chancellor James Leutze said these goals have been set in order to increase the academic quality of the student body, as well as the school graduation rate and retention rate.

"My obligation is to make the institution better," Leutze said.

Diane Zeeman, in the UNCW

Admissions office that although UNCW standards for admission have risen, that does not mean the school now requires a student's SAT score to be higher. She said UNCW uses a formula for assessing applicants for admission in which the student's SAT score counts for one-third and the student's high school grade point average counts for two-thirds of the student's score.

If a student does not do well on the SAT, the student is still able to get in UNCW by having a good GPA. Zeeman said the high school GPA is typically a better predictor of college performance than the SAT.

Leutze said the North Carolina General Assembly is pressuring UNCW and other universities to increase its graduation rates. By raising admissions standards, Leutze said UNCW hopes to increase the number of students who can stay in school and graduate in four years.

N. C. law requires that no more than 18 percent of UNCW's freshman class come from out of state. Leutze said he believes out of state students bring something to the university. He also said that by raising admission requirements, UNCW gives area high school students something to aspire to, and in this way helps these students to raise their SAT scores.

According to Zeeman, many students in N.C. score much better on the SAT than the national average. Leutze said UNCW wants to offer an attractive location to these students.

UNCW Students Look Into Kennedy Assassination

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

As the 30th anniversary of the Kennedy assassination approaches, senior students in the communication department at UNCW are reexamining what has become one of the most compelling controversies in contemporary America: Who shot John F. Kennedy?

Seniors enrolled in Communications 490, "Rhetoric of JFK Assassination Theories" examine various theories regarding the assassination of President Kennedy from a rhetorical point of view. The course, which is part history, part political, and part communications, is team-taught by Dr. Bruce McKinney and Dr. Steven Weiss. Their senior seminar is attempting to sift through numerous leads and mountains of information that include conspiracy theories ranging from anti-Castro Cubans to the French Corsican Mafia.

Students in the class are absorbed with the seminar. They have strong responses and enormous participation. They treat conspiracy as a genre of argument in how they make their claims, analyze, and criticize theories. The majority of the students entered the course with the assumption that conspiracy was the nature of the plot to kill Kennedy.

On student said, "The question of who killed JFK is a question of whether or not you can trust your government to deal with you squarely. Most of us have grown up in a post-JFK world where we implicitly mistrust our leaders."

"We're thirty years into this debate," says McKinney, an expert on the JFK assassination whose publications include in-depth analysis of the Warren Commission's deliberative process. "There are still as many if not more questions than when we first started examining the issue. I don't know if we'll ever unravel the mystery," he said.

There have been approximately 15 new books published in recognition of the approaching 30 year anniversary of the Kennedy assassination. Case Closed, by Gerald Posner is the only book that uses computer modeling to recreate the crime. In his book, Posner suggests that there was a conspiracy to kill Kennedy. Case Closed is expected to trigger more book publication and counter arguments.

Despite thousands of books pointing to a conspiracy, Weiss remains skeptical. "I just can't imagine that an event that is so contemporaneous with our own experience could still be so completely enigmatic. I've got to believe if Oswald didn't act alone, then we'd know pretty clearly by now what happened on Nov. 22, 1963."

Choosing the Good-Still Realistic

I had an opportunity to do a workshop on personal ethics recently which put me into a thoughtful mood as I tried to figure out the useful process to focus attention on the reality of practical ethics in a world of continuing ethical complexity.

The main stream ethical process in a pluralistic society finds individuals and groups trying to make decisions that balance the rights of an individual and the needs of the community (rooted in John Stuart Mills' Utilitarianism). Our US legal system and the process by which we establish law through Congress in this country as well as individuals trying to live a moral life all act out this struggle as a part of a healthy process having the best chance of meeting individual and communal needs.

The problem comes, in my view, because we are losing commitment to maintaining an ethical society in favor of skewing choices toward the rights of individuals. When ever there is a discussion about ethics around ethical scenarios in which I am not personally involved, it is common for all of us to espouse our commitment to this balance of needs. We all see ourselves as moral individuals and we all want to be a part of a moral society. In an intellectual discussion, we have little difficulty in opposing cheating or sexism in the office place or racism or homophobia.

But when we wind up in a personal situation that calls for our exercising our ideals, a whole other dynamic comes to play of which we need to be aware if we are going to have any chance of living out our ideals in the daily process of living and choosing. We may oppose homophobia, but when a personal friend makes an ugly comment about gay men, we find ourselves keeping silent. When another student has obvious racist feelings and even acts them out with racist messages, we are not willing to risk any relationships and the appearance of being self-righteous by confronting that student who lives on our hall. If someone believes that abortion is wrong and proclaims that perspective for years and then finds themselves or their girlfriend pregnant, it is not uncommon for that pregnancy to be terminated by abortion.

The factor that comes into play in moments of real ethical decision making is fear, fear about what might happen to us if we carry through our pregnancy, fear about what our friends might think about us if we were to stand up for a principle in the face of unethical behavior in someone who is our friend, fear that prevents us from confronting much less turning in another student involved in flagrant cheating because we suddenly discover that we are unwilling to breath the norm that says, "You don't tell on someone else." When adhering to ethical principles involves any kind of risk to our self-interests or our perceptions of what other people think of us, we too often find ourselves unable to act as we thought we would.

In a broader sense, letting fear determine our choices is but one dimension of a larger issue. It seems to me that self-interest, the one part of the equation which seeks to be balanced on the other end by the welfare of the community, has taken almost absolute ascendancy these days. A recent article described a woman who was enraged because her health insurance company, after paying for two unsuccessful attempts at invitro fertilization, had refused to reimburse her for further infertility treatments. "They're depriving me of my right to become a mother," she said, "and I'm going to sue them." This sense of "my right" seems unbalanced to me when set against the needs of our society to control medical costs. I understand her feelings, but the claim of "my right" has no sense of understanding any rights of the community. "I" and "my needs" or "my fear" seem to dominate any ethical choice stumbled upon in the course of daily living and, I think, such a perspective is unbalanced and wrong.

So how do we increase our chances of strengthening our personal integrity so that actions match our ideals? A significant resource is and always has been to be part of a community that continually holds up the ideals by which I want to live my life and promises support for living with integ-

ity. It may be our family, it may be a community of faith or a friend, with whom we are close enough to share our fears and struggles that come because we desire to do what is right in any given situation. Beyond such a support system, my spiritual life provides a powerful impetus to live out the Truth in my daily life. For those whom God is personal reality, that power can be just as strong as a loving friend, probably stronger since it is consistently dependable.

I don't think a life of integrity is possible for most people on their own. We are so often insecure and live in a world that is insecure. We need support, some force outside ourselves so that we can do not only what we want, but what we ought, but what we ought, Martin Luther King once said, "In order to live creatively and meaningfully, self concern must be wedded to other concerns." I agree. I hope you do as well and that you either have or will intentionally seek a support system that will allow you to come out of real ethical choices with a sense of integrity.

Native Americans: A Forgotten People

When browsing through history books, I can recall being taught American history. We all learned about the relationships between the European settlers and Native Americans and how thousands of Native Americans (or Indians as some would call them, but I will call them Native Americans, a more appropriate term) lost their lives and their land. Take a look around you. Depending on the geographic location, you won't see that many Native American faces. How many Native American people have you come into contact with? Many of us will probably say none.

What happens to the Native Americans? How could a race of people vanish from the face of the Earth? My friends, even though it seems as though they cease to exist, they are still among us. The Native American population is still growing in number. I, myself, have some Cherokee ancestry. Many Native Americans have been assimilated into the mainstream white culture. There are very few full bloods left. Many of the younger generation have forgotten their culture or don't really care to learn it. This is an absolute shame. Thanks to pow-wows, Native American culture can be revived, but still this isn't enough. We, as a collective American society, need to do more to help Native Americans. It was their land. We owe them.

Looking at statistics, Native Americans face huge problems. They have the highest rate of drug and alcohol abuse than that of whites or blacks. The suicide rate among them is phenomenal. According to the Journal of Counseling and Development (Nov.-Dec. 1990), suicide has reached 1000% over the past 20 years. Something must be done. We should try to protect our earth the way some of our forefathers did. Time is running out. It's not just a Native American problem. It's a problem for all of us. It's time for all of us to stop being self-centered and become involved. We need to save a culture that can save ours.

On Top Of The Carrot

I had never seen anything like it. It wasn't just the act that amazed me, it was also the way the people reacted to it. No, I'm not talking about something I saw at The Doll House.

I'm talking about Carrot Top. Man, what a show. It wasn't just the fact he's funny-as-hell, he was cool. It wasn't just what he said, it was the way he said it.

How can one person think up so much messed up stuff? Who thinks about putting a bumper on a slipper for those midnight forays through the living room? Who thinks about putting a beaded driver's cushion on a toilet for those prolonged stays? Then says those dimples on the face are the worst.

Carrot Top puts on a show. It has comedy, pyrotechnics, music, audience participation, and no one is safe.

I got to talk to him after the show and was impressed by his commitment to his fans. Some acts come to town, do the show, and leave as soon as they are done. Not Carrot Top. He was back on stage after the show signing autographs and talking with those who lined up. He told everyone during the show he was going to Hooters after the show and he was ready to party.

Not many people showed up at Hooters after the show, but Carrot Top and opening act Eric Godfrey were there talking with anyone who came up.

Though many didn't show up at Hooters, the show at Kenan Auditorium was a sell-out. Association for Campus Entertainment Comedy Chair Vern Granger said the show sold out of its 800 pre-show tickets at 1 p.m. the day of the show and the 100 tickets at the door sold briskly.

At $8 for students and $10 for non, nobody complained about the price. The show, and it is a show, is easily worth more.

Carrot Top said during and after the show that UNCW is one of his favorite places to perform. "The crowd is so crazy. It's cool."

This is the second show for him at UNCW, and his second sell-out. He was a little concerned that he may be coming back too soon, but the crowd told him he need not worry.

Some people braved the 40 degree weather for as much as two hours to get a good seat.

Carrot Top's show was part of the Association for Campus Entertainment program of bringing national acts to campus. Chairs Vern Granger and A. P. Blake need to be congratulated on this.

I talked to Carrot Top and his opening act Eric Godfrey after the show and they are as funny off stage as they are on.

Carrot Top thinks it is hysterical that Florida has two teams in the National Hockey League and Texas has one, and there are none in Minnesota.

Godfrey liked Gore in seven in the NAFTA debate, but Carrot Top liked the parachute.

It was nice to talk to two guys who make a living being funny. They were both quick with one liners. What really impressed me though was they were always thinking about how they could improve their show.

During talks about the show, a line or two would come out that could make a joke in the show funnier and either Carrot Top or Godfrey would write it down. That is professionalism.

Carrot Top even told me after the show that he doesn't use any hair care products to maintain his Windywaye style.

This was Carrot Top's second sell-out in seven months and he will be back.

His return may be delayed because he soon starts filming his television show for NBC. The show will begin airing in the summer as a replacement series.

It was nice to see him sign autographs after the show and talk to fans. I saw the Allman Brothers here last year, and a couple members of the band couldn't have cared less about the fans. Not Carrot Top.

Godfrey deserves a pat on the back for his role in the show, too. No, not for having us do that ridiculous wave. God, how I hate the wave. He is responsible for getting Carrot Top to each of his shows, selling T-shirts, and for helping clean up the stage after the show. A job no one should want.

The funniest part of the show was the musical medley at the end that has to be

Hand Over the Diaries or Else

WASHINGTON—Am I the only one who thinks Bob Packwood has a case for refusing to hand over his diaries to the Senate Ethics Committee?

Not a legal case, perhaps. I've watched enough "Perry Mason" to know that introduction of a subject or a document by one side to make a point can open up the entire subject or document to cross examination. Packwood, thinking to help his defense against charges of sexual harassment and witness intimidation, put portions of his diaries on the table. The committee now wants the whole thing—not just to substantiate his charges against Packwood but to see if perhaps there is evidence of other wrongdoing.

Already, according to press reports, they have found evidence suggesting that the beleaguered Oregonian once pressured a lobbyist to give his ex-wife a job, apparently in an effort to reduce his alimony payments. The committee is now said to be investigating that—possibly criminal charge. Is any wonder Packwood wants his diaries back?

My questions, by the way, have nothing to do with charges that brought the 61-year-old Republican, blustering and squirming, before the Ethics Committee. Those charges—that he force his crude attentions on several women and that he tried to intimidate witnesses who might have testified against him—can be settled in fairly routine ways. It is largely a matter of whether to believe Packwood or the women—staffers and casual acquaintances alike—who paint him as an habitual groper.

The charges, if proven, demand some form of official sanction by his colleagues. (The courts have ruled that his withholding of information regarding the allegations during his recent Senate campaign was enough to void his re-election to a fifth term.)

What concerns me are the diaries. These are not documents in the sense of office files or financial records. These are the senator's private musings, cited by him solely for the purpose of showing that there was a contemporaneous exculpatory account (his of events that constitute a part of the charges against him).

Should he be able to offer that limited rebuttal without opening up the whole of the diaries to what comes close to being a "fishing expedition"? Think of being accused of non-payment of a bill and offering canceled check as evidence. Should your cousin then have the right to paw through your financial records? Lawyers will make the in-for-a-penny-in-for-a-pound argument. Packwood, they'll tell you, could have kept the Fifth Amendment defense against self-incrimination. What he can't do, they say, is take just a sip or two out of the Fifth.

What about his Fourth Amendment right to privacy? Same thing, they'll say. What the committee has in mind, its members insist, is not a pascatory excursion; they know where the fish are—they've seen them jumping out of those diaries—and it's too late for Packwood to post a no-fishing sign.

Still Packwood, himself a lawyer, has a point. He offered the committee a deal: Let former solicitor general Kenneth Starr, or some similarly respected and disinterested arbiter, look at the diaries for the 1989-1993 period in question and report to the committee any material relevant to the charges against him.

Would Starr (or whoever) be able to see, unedited, every page? Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) wanted to know at yesterday's hearing.

Every page, said Packwood. And if he found evidence of wrongdoing not related to the charges already on the table, would he have to pretend blindness?

Which, of course, is just the point. It seems silly to suggest that if an independent reviewer came upon smoking-gun evidence of criminality, he would have to keep it quiet. But what of evidence which, inconclusive by itself, pointed the way toward additional investigation of new charges?

The National Football League's now-discontinued "instant replay" procedure may have some relevance. Officials could go to the videotape to substantiate or disprove the charge already made, but they couldn't use it to bring additional charges—no matter how clear or egregious the offense might be.

I make no defense regarding the other—original—charges against Packwood. I'd even guess that he's probably guilty (though I'd like to hear some testimony and see some evidence). And though his legislative record is as progressive as his alleged personal conduct is disarming, it would not distress me if he should retire and leave the Senate.

But on the specific matter of the diaries, I wish they'd get off his case.

Is Congress Delegitimizing Itself?

WASHINGTON—New York City's political class, having failed to master the problems engulfing that city, has finally outsmarted something: itself. It counted on courts to relieve it of its democratic duty to debate the issue of term limits. Not smart. On Tuesday, the nation's largest city imposed limits—two consecutive four-year terms, starting now—on its elected officials.

The political class everywhere tried to prevent term-limitation proposals from coming to a vote because limits almost always win. However, New York City's life is permeated by government that a robust anti-term-limits campaign might have mustered a majority. The fact that New York's political class failed to stop term limits is a monument to the arrogance of that class.

When supporters of term limits got the requisite number of signatures on petitions, the city government spent tax dollars attempting to get courts to deny taxpayers the right to vote on limits. Politicians assured reporters, who in turn assured editors, that the courts—the first refuge of the politically unpermeable—would block the initiative. When the courts did not, the media, perhaps filling misled and wanted to make amends to the public, gave the coming vote on limits heavy coverage.

By then, there were only 13 days until the vote. That was not enough time for the political class to mobilize the public employees who prosper from their relationship of mutual aggrandizement with political careerists. New York City has more full-time and part-time public employees—444,000—than Kansas City has residents.

Furthermore, 13 days were not enough time for the political class to terrify all the other people who are, or aspired to be, dependent in various ways on the decisions of the city's elephantine government. These people included many groups who might have been susceptible to this argument: you will suffer from the termination of political careerism because careerists are unbalanced about using public spending and other government action to purchase the affections of myriad constituencies, including you.

The constituencies susceptible to such an anti-term-limit campaign include people doing business with the city government. A $31 billion budget can enrich many vendors. The susceptible constituencies include developers, construction unions and anyone else needing government's approval to do business. And, of course welfare recipients are a constituency for political careerists. John Fund of The Wall Street Journal notes that if the city's 1.1 million welfare recipients were themselves a city, it would be the nation's eighth largest. The New York Times attacked term limitation, warning that "limits can foster mediocrity," an argument particularly unpersuasive in New York City, where mediocrity would be a distinct improvement. Reporters, too, seemed hostile to term limits, perhaps because limits mean disruption of comfortable relationships with familiar sources. Also, term limits rest on the assumption that governments can be run by "raw amateurs" rather than "seasoned professionals," two favorite phrases of opponents of term limits. If so, government is not such a high mystery after all, a mystery requiring a clerical of journalists to decipher it.

Anyway, on Tuesday, New Yorkers did what voters almost invariably do when given the opportunity: they imposed limits. Also on Tuesday three other large jurisdictions were given a chance to impose limits and all three did. Two are counties in New York State—Suffolk on Long Island and Monroe, which includes Rochester. Maine imposed limits on its state legislators and some other officials. So term limits came to jurisdictions containing 10 million Americans.

Fourteen states have already imposed limits on their state legislators. Fifteen have imposed limits on their U.S. representatives and senators. Next year, other states almost certainly will join the parade. Last year, when term limits for U.S. congressmen and senators were on 14 states' ballots, limits won in all, 14 and got more votes in the 14 than Ross Perot got in 50.

Among the hundreds of municipalities with term limits extending beyond their mayors—city councils, etc.—are Anaheim, Anchorage, Billings, Cincinnati, Colorado Springs, Dallas, El Paso, Fargo, Fresno, Galveston, Honolulu, Houston, Jacksonville, Kansas City, Long Beach, New Orleans, Phoenix, St. Petersburg, San Diego, San Francisco, San Jose, Santa Barbara, Syracuse, Tacoma, Tampa, and Wichita.

All of this raises two questions. When will Congress abandon the pretense that it is so different, or so successful, or so something that it must be forever exempt from limits? And when will the snowballing successes of the term-limits movement—the most potent grass-roots movement in America today—become so numerous that Congress will be delegitimized if it continues to refuse to send a term-limiting constitutional amendment to the states for debate and decision?

By George Will, a member of the Washington Post Writers Group

"Nah-nah nee boo-boo, we got our bonds no thanks to YOU!"

I just don't get it. But then again maybe I do. I ask myself, "Phil, why is it that a state with our reputation for education barely (53-47%) passes a bond referendum that will help with much needed construction in the state's universities?" But then again I guess ignorance begets ignorance. I guess that 47% of our populace is happy with being 49th in the nation in education (thank goodness for South Carolina!).

Some (actually all) of the counties bordering New Hanover did not pass the referendum for University improvements. Perhaps there should have been a referendum for construction of more deer stands? I guess this is what one would expect from an area with a history of making such wise decisions in their governments and with the hiring and firing of government officials. How silly of me to expect more from a region where the "right turn of red" concept has never been fully grasped.

Anyhow, I commend Chancellor Leutze for his efforts, especially standing out on College Road with a "Thank You" sign for the public. It took bravery unmatched to stand out there with all those maniac Wilmington drivers, and gratitude unmatched to say "thanks" to such an undeserving crowd. Personally I would have divided the sign, let's say 53/47, with the top part saying "Thank You" and the bottom portion saying "Nah-nah nee boo-boo, we got our bonds no thanks to YOU!"

Auditorium on Monday night. If you weren't there, then you missed quite an opportunity to blow eight bucks. Actually, it was a pretty good show. I just won't say too many good things about it considering the fact that ACE somehow misplaced the complimentary tickets they should have sent me. Evidently some folks did get complimentary tickets because there were about 15,000 people in the auditorium. It's called "the fire code," look into it.

There was this guy, Chuck from Surf 107, who came out to introduce the opening act. I swear he was a perfect cross between Mr. T and the Fonzy (you just had to be there). The opening act was okay...if you did not see him last year. I sat there and recited his lines to the folks beside me right up until the "Aunt Shirley flashing people at the race track episode." At least he was funny; I still laugh at the thought of the four foot, five inch, 618 pound lady in the spandex shorts at Disney World.

Carol Mop was fantastic. He used some old stuff as well as some good new stuff. He struck home when he related a story of how the Rental Cops from his college campus once tore down his door in search of an illegal hot plate while the other 3,999 people in the dorm were engaged in felonious activity. (Note: It is not the policy of NoBull Prize winning journalism to endorse and or condone the mentioned the still current policy of returning "4,000.00 worth" of books to the campus bookstore for a whopping $0.50 return.

The HAT'S OFF award this week goes to Mr. Charlie B. Davis. Charlie is a generally cool dude and he made this issue possible in a round about sort of way. Hat's Off to Chuck for a job well done. The SHOE'S OFF award for the week goes to all of the folks around who did not vote for the new Physical Science building (hereafter known as Smith Hall). So to those who voted "no" as well as those who didn't bother to vote, I issue you all Shoe's Off because that stinks. Thanks for nothing.

Well friends, that about ends things for this edition. I guess you could tell that it was a slow week for NoBull prize winning commentary, but please remember that it is the thought that counts. By the way, I'm still taking submissions for the "Stupid Things Professors Say" issue. As always, your comments, criticisms, praises, and leftover Halloween candy are certainly welcome. Address them to me, in care of The Seahawk. And until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Fool For Love, by Sam Shepard

A one act play produced, designed, and directed by UNCW students. Shepard is an American playwright whose on-screen talent is as well known as his prolific stage and screen play work. A characteristic of most of Shepard's plays is the stream of conscience that his characters live in. The audience becomes the "third eye." He teaches the audience by giving them insight into the characters that they themselves do not know. This tactic draws the audience in and makes them sympathize with, take pity on, or thoroughly hate Shepard's characters. The audience can relate to the characters.

Fool For Love is a roller-coaster ride that buckles you in, climbs to great heights, plummets down to treacherous depths, winds and swoops past precarious curves, then loops up-side-down for a grand finale and lets you off with a slowing down then breathtaking stop. Shockingly, there you are, back in your own life.

Hey Guys, What About A Job For Me?

Did you find your dream job at the recent career opportunities fair at Trask Coliseum? Probably not if you're an English, art, music, or acting major. There were plenty of job opportunities for nurses, criminal justice majors, money wizards, and mad scientists, but what about the rest of us? Even the oceanographers and archaeologists among us had some options, although not much. For the rest of us, the pickings were slim to none.

Beginning at the door, I worked my way around to each booth. At each exhibit, I introduced myself and shook hands (firmly, so they'd know I'm no wimp). When they didn't run away upon learning my name, I figured the first hurdle was passed. The company and employment possibilities were explained to me. Uh oh, here's where the trouble began.

I discovered I'm not qualified to perform fiber optic research for Corning, and no, they're not looking for administrative personnel. The hospitalists didn't want me, I guess their belief in preventative medicine entails keeping the public safe from my inadequate and inept ministrations.

I tried really hard to behave myself at the IRS booth, but that fellow kept looking askance at me (oh God, does he remember my last tax return?). This possibility was not quite in my realm of expertise, the IRS wants people with accounting skills. A quick glance at my checkbook and all the little notations marked "oops!" in lieu of actual entries would no doubt immediately exempt me from employment with the IRS.

None of the military representatives want me. I think it's my irreverent attitude they don't like. I smile too much and have this annoying habit of saying exactly what I think. Besides, they said I was too old for military service. Well, poop on them, olive drab isn't a flattering color for me anyway.

I tried the Secret Service and, again, I'm told I'm too old. It seems their cut-off is at 37 years. Yes, I bitched about it, but my protest went to no avail. Maybe they're right, I'm not sure I can keep secrets at my advanced age. Too bad for you, I told the not-so-secret fellow of the Secret Service. I may be old but I am cute! No telling what kind of secrets I could have wormed out of the enemy.

On and on this story of rejection continued. Even the police turned me down. Really, maybe these people ought to just make a recording, when they see me coming they could just push a button and the litany, "You're too old," could save them their breath. What a shame, at least some of the police departments have blue uniforms. That's a nice color, I can see me in blue. However, I would have had to modify that heavy old gun belt thing, my baboonas are big enough without emphasizing the problem. Really, where do these people get their fashion sense?

North Carolina is becoming known for its writers, so where are these employers hiding?

UPS was a possible employer for any major. Admirably, but unfortunately for me, their company is built upon the premise that you start on the ground floor (shoving boxes) and move up in the ranks. To be honest, I really haven't worked my butt off at UNCW learning to write in order to shove 70-pound boxes around. I did offer to serve as a technical writer, that's one of the things I'm trained to do. Sure, the UPS representatives agreed, but you have to start with those boxes. Fine, you start with the bloody boxes, not me. Well, at least someone semantically.

I was very disappointed with this job fair thing. The reasoning behind the employment presentation is sound, and the people who organized it really worked hard. But, being me, I do have some suggestions for improvement.

We need to remember UNCW offers a number of degree programs. Therefore, it follows that the logical thing to do is look for, at the least, one potential employer in each field. No sense in my discussing the science, medical and criminal justice fields, there seems to be a glut of possibilities in these areas. But the English, music, art and drama degree students need some help. Otherwise, why bother with offering these degrees? We have to pay car insurance, buy food and have a roof over our heads just like everyone else.

For example, I was hoping to talk with a representative from the Wilmington Star News. Now here's a real live working newspaper operating in our city. There's a lot of talk about educating the worker of tomorrow. Further, the city of Wilmington serves and is served by this university. Wouldn't it be a benefit to try to attract college graduates into staying and becoming working citizens of Wilmington? If you don't want us to stay in Wilmington, you might remember it isn't the only city in North Carolina with a newspaper. And, surprise, newspapers need working staff members, so clue us in on these companies.

North Carolina is becoming known for its writers, so where are these employers hiding? And what about the magazines being published in this state? Now that I'm on this band wagon, what about all the people complaining 'cause some unknown and mysterious Johnny can't read. There's always some gd or other for a literacy class, who do you think teaches those unidentified illiterates? English majors, of course. So, where are these employers? I could go on and on, but I think you get my drift.

As for the artists, musicians and thespians at UNCW, how about some representatives from museums, theater groups, symphonies, the movie industry, and so on. Printers need graphic artists, magazines and newspapers need illustrators. The movie industry is alive and well in Wilmington, and guess what, they use real live people to get things done. Someone has to design theater costumes and backdrops, and somebody has to play in the orchestra pit at Thalian Hall.

Get the idea? Finally, I'd like to say we need the nurses, police officers, military, and even the mad scientists of the world. But where do you think their textbooks, operation procedures, reports, etc. originate? Someone somewhere has to write these materials. Further, who do you think writes the books, magazines, newspapers, radio, television, and theater shows you enjoy? Use some common sense here. English, art, music, and drama majors are not second class citizens; we're the background of our culture and purveyors of the future. So, how about some employer representatives for us?

In The Spotlight

A close-up look of dead-reckoning - a local Wilmington Band

The Band: dead-reckoning from: ASZAMS records

Music: Progressive and Rock originals, some covers

Experience: dead-reckoning has been together for over a year, playing at clubs and college campuses all over the southeast, and performing with such notable acts as The Connells, Hootie and the Blowfish, The Sex Police, and others.

Recordings: dead-reckoning recently completed production on its' first EP, "Faithless Me," which was released on compact disc by ASZAMS records. The band celebrated this accomplishment by playing a very successful "C.D. release party" at The Mad Monk on Thursday, October 21st, 1993.

Alan Callahan: Bass and Vocals
Brian Farmer: Guitar and Vocals
Scott Macconnell: Drums
Spruill: Vocals and Guitar

"Faithless Me" release date: December 1, 1993

Produced by: Mark Bryan and dead-reckoning

A Little Info: This new EP is an esthetic blend of unforgettable melodies, lush three-part harmonies, and rich, sweeping, guitars resulting in the kind of "hypnotic groove" which is hard to find in today's market. This is not to suggest that the EP doesn't thoroughly jam. It does! However, the intelligence of the music never gets lost behind a lot of random noise. "Faithless Me" is a diverse compilation of styles. As each song effectively creates a different mood, the band's diverse influences, ranging from pop to R&B, are revealed.

Primus Sucks!

By Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Last Thursday night I had a chance to go and see one of my favorite bands. Primus played a show in Raleigh at a new club called the Ritz. Without a doubt, this was one of the best concerts I've ever been to. I'd say top 5 all-time Jorgenson concert list material. Unfortunately, The Ritz wasn't as good.

First let me talk about the show. The Melvins was the opening act. They started about 8 p.m. I had never heard the Melvins before and they were very good (I'd liken them to Ministry without all the sampling). But I was really there for Primus so during the opening act, I was anxious for it to be over. Shortly after the Melvins finished, Primus came out on stage about 9:30 ish. From the get go, they let us have it. The show was loud, the lighting was weird and the music was intense. The whole crowd (except the parents) was dancing to the music and the pit up front was intense.

The band played songs mostly from their Frizzle Fry and Pork Soda albums with a few songs from Sailing the Crazy Chorus. Toward the beginning of the show they played back to back fishing songs. For those of you who don't know about or listen to Primus, they have a song about fishing on every album. Thursday night they played "Fish On" followed by "The Ol' Diamond Back Surgeon" which left me at the edge of an emotional cliff.

With the next song, I couldn't contain myself anymore so a friend of mine started shoving me towards the front. No longer able to think rationally I began to press forward. As I broke from the crowd and into the pit area I regained some consciousness. Primus was playing "Podding Time" and immediately I was swept into the mosh.

Only a few moments later the band broke from their song and went into a slower song of Ministry's "Thieves." At this point I lost my mind. I was jumping, screaming and having fun in an inhuman and unexplainable fashion. From "Thieves" they went back into "Podding Time" and finished the song. I stayed in the pit for a couple more songs before the intense beat drove me back to the bar. The show ended about 11:30 and I was soaked with sweat, out of breath, and ready to party on into the night, so that's what I did.

As for the Ritz, it had its good points and bad ones. First, it's an all age club (good) and it's big enough to attract good bands and good crowds (good). But the club can't give you a can of beer, they have to pour it into a cup (bad). Also the show started at 8 p.m. (bad) which is way too early. With the early start, the whole show was done by 11:30 (bad) and they expected you to leave at that point in time (very bad). Last but not least, it's a non-smoking establishment (bad) and they won't let you leave and come back in (worse).

OVERALL RATING: A

Seattle Re-Emerges!

By Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

I was wrong about something last week in my article on the re-emergence of Seattle music. Pearl Jam's album is not entitled Five Against One, it is merely self titled Pearl Jam and is subtitled Five Against One.

As the follow up to their debut album Ten I had extremely high hopes and expectations of the album. At first I was disappointed and under the impression that Pearl Jam had lost their emotional power. Boy was I wrong! After listening to the CD several times I came to realize that this one is just as good as Ten. It's full of power and emotion, like their first album, but it also expands musically and shows how diverse, the band is.

The first two songs, "Go" and "Animal" are typical Pearl Jam. They have the quick pace and jamming sound accompanies by Vedder's anguished singing. "Animal" can be seen on MTV when they replay the live performance of it by the Band at the last MTV Music Video Awards. The next song "Daughter" begins to give the listener insight into Pearl Jam's diversity. The song is slower and predominantly acoustic. It's almost ballad like quality shows a side of Pearl Jam that I didn't see on the last album.

Next, "Glorified G" is a slight return to the Pearl Jam of old, but it is smacks of mellowness. Vedder gets into a little screaming toward the middle but it is still a relatively mellow song.

The next two songs, "Dissident" and "W.M.A." are anything but mellow. Where "Daughter" (Continued) moves away from traditional Pearl Jam in one direction, "Dissident" and "W.M.A." move away in the other. They are both just totally jammed out (although "Dissident" does start out slower), but more importantly they are full of emotion. On both songs I can just picture Vedder standing there singing with his eyes squeezed shut and about to shake himself into a seizure. I really did these songs.

"Blood" is yet another emotional song. And if its possible, it rages even more than "Dissident" and "W.M.A.". It's really an incredibly draining song. "Rearviewmirror" gives the listener a break because it returns back to a "normal" style. "Rats" follows it up and takes the same normal speed but musically it is different. I can almost hear a little influence from Primus in a few bass lines and the guitars.

"Elderly Women Behind the Counter in a Small Town" is yet another trip into mellow stuff. Like "Daughter" it has an acoustic sound and almost could be considered a ballad (but not quite). "Leash" is like "Blood". It just totally goes off musically, vocally and lyrically. "To me it is almost an anthem for today's youth. Lines like "Drop the leash! We are young." and "Drop the leash! Get out of my fuc... face." Describes not only some feelings of today's youth but of all youth through time. Our parents probably can't remember or just want to forget the fact that at times, they felt the same way.

Finally "Indifference" ends the album. This song is probably one of the more different ones on the album. It is very slow and melodic. The instruments are shadowed to Vedder's voice and it almost sounds like Eddie singing acapello with slight hints of music in the background.

Overall the album is awesome. I feel its just as good as Ten and I'll give it 4 1/2 stars. (By the way, I consider White Zombie's La Sexorcisto 5 stars if you're wondering about how I calibrate my musical scale.)

Now, on a completely different subject, I just wanted to say something to June Oravits. Go get the tattoo. Who cares what it might look like when you're 80. Periodic touch-up tattooing can keep it looking just fine besides, when you're that old, it's the meaning of the tattoo that is important.

2. H. Ross Perot said if we voted for the bond it would be bad. Perot is always right!

UNCW Gets Beta Gamma Sigma Chapter

Thursday, Oct. 28th, the first chapter of Beta Gamma Sigma was installed at UNCW. Beta Gamma Sigma is the national honor society for collegiate schools of business that have been accredited by the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of business (a high achievement earned by UNCW's Cameron School of Business last year). Thirty-one students at Cameron were offered membership in BGS based on their outstanding scholastic achievements. The induction ceremony was held at Cameron and conducted by Dean Howard Rockness, who is also a member of BGS. Special guests included Dr. James F. Balardon of the BGS Board of Governors. A small reception honoring new members followed the ceremony.

The members of the new chapter would like to extend their most sincere appreciation to all of the faculty, staff and participants for the trouble and expense of the recognition.

UNCW Helps Secondary School Students

BY FIONA RICE
Staff Writer

Students in kindergarten through twelfth grade can get help with their homework this year from the "Dial-A-Teacher Homework Assistance" program.

From 6 - 8 p.m., Monday through Thursday, students can call 395-3009 and reach a student volunteer for help with their homework. The 40 volunteers come from area high schools, UNCW, and community businesses.

The program is funded by UNCW's School of Education. Randall Library provides the facilities. New Hanover County Public Schools provided the organizer of the program. Grade six through twelve textbooks were provided by Dr. Mark Soane, Assistant Superintendent for Instructional Services. The developer and director of the project is Jennifer Wellons, a seventh-grade teacher at Roland-Grise Junior High school.

Wellons organized a similar program in Greenville, N.C. She said "Eighty percent of the calls were math related." In anticipation of the same need here, the program has relied heavily on volunteers from the UNCW N.C. Teaching Fellows Scholarship program, students in math education, and engineers in the community.

If you are interested in volunteering, please call the community schools coordinator at 763-5431 or Wellons at 791-2363.

This Week In Sports

SOCCER BY ERIK TOTTEN Sports Editor

UNC Wilmington's soccer team concluded an outstanding season under first-year coach Keith Cammidge last Thursday, dropping a 5-0 decision to Richmond in the first round of the Colonial Athletic Association Soccer Tournament in Richmond, Va.

The Seahawks recorded their highest victory total in five years, finishing with a 9-9 record, including a 6-1 mark to start the season. UNCW, which played through several injuries and a thin lineup all season, went 3-4 in the CAA to earn its highest regular season finish (4th place) since joining the league in 1985.

Junior forward Bucky Corban, who led UNCW in scoring with 30 points (12 goals, 6 assists), was named first-team All-CAA at the league's awards banquet last Wednesday, while senior fullback Paul Cairney and freshman defender Steve Kozowski were named to the second team. Junior forward Joel Myers was also one of the keys to UNCW's offensive turnaround this season, scoring 26 points on 12 goals and two assists.

As a team, the Seahawks scored 35 goals compared to just eight goals last season, and outshot the opposition, 273-238.

VOLLEYBALL BY MAUREN FITZSIMMONS Sports Writer

The UNCW Lady Seahawks are currently holding an overall record of 18-14 and a CAA record of 2-3. This team has had a strong season and it's not surprising considering the outstanding efforts of veteran players Bobbi Pate and Amy Chilausky.

Senior Amy Chilausky was named Colonial Athletic Association Player-of-the-Week as UNCW went 3-2 with victories over CAA rival East Carolina, Lehigh and Navy in the Navy-Forrestal Tournament over the weekend. Amy Chilausky ranks second in CAA kill average (3.71) and third in block average (1.11). Statistically, Amy leads the Seahawks in kills (444), hitting percentage (.262), solo blocks (44) and assist blocks (88). Veteran player Bobbi Pate is second in the CAA in dig average (3.36) while she tops the Lady Seahawks with 400. Monday night's game was the last home appearance for these two seniors.

In defeating East Carolina the final scores were 15-9, 15-11, 14-16, 15-12, while Lehigh's defeat came with scores of 15-7, 15-6, 15-6. Senior Athlete Profile

BU JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Amy Chilausky is one of two seniors and a mid-biter for the UNCW Women's Volleyball team. Amy is from Durham, North Carolina and will graduate in the Fall of 1994 with a degree in Communications.

Amy moved from New Jersey to North Carolina when she was going into the eighth grade where she began her involvement with volleyball since there wasn't any volleyball in the schools in New Jersey. Her sister, who is three years older, tried out for volleyball in high school which also sparked Amy's interest in the sport. Therefore she started playing volleyball in Junior High School in Durham. Their team was very successful and had a good coach. In her junior year of high school, Amy participated in the Duke Volleyball Camp to strengthen her game even more, which the UNCW coaches also attended to scout out players. In her senior year, the UNCW coaches coached her, and Amy came down for a recruiting visit. She really liked the campus and the beach, but the determining factor for her to attend UNCW was the fact she liked the girls on the team and the coaches. It was a hard decision for Amy to make a choice between universities, but she just knew she wanted to come to UNCW.

Also Amy had a lot of friends from high school come to UNCW who liked it and some good players of the USVBA (United States Volleyball Association) came to UNCW for school, so she trusted their decision to come here to make her decision. Amy has high expectations for the UNCW Women's Volleyball team in her final season. Even though the team is young and inexperienced, Amy feels that if everyone works hard and wants to do well they can be very successful. "If everyone goes out in each game and plays the best that they can, we will have a good season," states Amy. Finishing up in her last season as a Lady Seahawk, Amy hopes to play to her full potential. Amy comments, "I want to finish my senior year playing the best I know I can play and help the team become as good as they can." She also would like to make All-Conference and keep her personal statistics high within the conference.

Amy has become a stronger hitter and a better defensive player being a member of the UNCW Women's Volleyball team. Over her four years, she has become more of a well-rounded player. In high school, Amy's offense wasn't as good as her defense and still is not that good but has improved a lot as a UNCW player. Amy feels she also has personally benefited from being a player on the team. "Any athlete I think benefits from being in an athletic program; they have to be dedicated, responsible, and schedule their time," Amy states. In addition, Amy has some of her closest friends as members of the volleyball team.

Amy is also a co-captain along with Bobbi Pate for the UNCW Women's Volleyball team. Her teammates can count on Amy on the court if they are in a tight situation, depend on her to keep the ball down, and trust her consistency. Her teammates also feel they can come to talk to Amy if they are having any kind of problem, because they know Amy will have the time for them and be interested in what they are saying. In the future, Amy plans to play USVBA and beach volleyball. She would like to coach volleyball also after she decides what she wants to do after she graduates. "I am very indecisive in what field I want to study in Communications," comments Amy. She knows she wants to work with people and has good qualities, such as openness, friendliness, and supportive to interact well with people. Academically, Amy didn't do too well her first two years in school, but she really picked up her grades a lot her junior and senior year. "I was really involved in volleyball, and I didn't really find doing Basic Studies interesting," reflects Amy of her beginning years at UNCW. Her friend, Josie Youngblood, liked her academically. "Josie is very dedicated to study and drives herself to do well in school, which was helpful for me to focus and has had an impact on my school performance," Amy states highly of her friend.

Two players, Sheldon Ptenovich and Leslie Knaus, have affected Amy in her own performance as a player. "Sheldon is the type of person who drives herself everyday and is determined to do well; he makes you and himself do the best that you can," states Amy. Sheldon is a very good and competitive player and has worked hard to become this way. Leslie, who was a member of the team last year, has also been very influential for Amy. "Leslie is my idol. She had a bad ankle problem her last two years playing and continued to play on it because she loved the game; she never gave up because she wanted to play," adds Amy. Amy has a lot of admiration for Leslie who is very driven as a player.

Amy's parents are a great part in her life. Her dad who is very athletic played football in college and is always there when she needs to talk about sports. Her mom is also supportive and is there for her to talk about school, friends and boys. They both follow her during her volleyball season along with her little brother to every game. "I've really enjoyed it and don't want to graduate and go out into the real world. I really like school and am happy with my major." I'm glad I played volleyball in college," Amy reflects about her experience at UNCW.

Flag Football

Last week the women's flag football tournament was underway. In the first round, Panty Rec. upset Alpha Phi on a last minute play that gave them the win: 7-6. Panty Rec. moved on to the championship game against the regular season champs, Club Soccer. Club Soccer came away with the victory 13-0 and the tournament championship.

UNCW hosts the Southern Atlantic Flag Football Invitational this Friday through Sunday on the Intramural fields. Sixteen men's teams from different universities around the region will play in a double elimination format, while four women's teams will play in a round robin tournament. The winners advance to the National Championships in New Orleans, December 27 through January 1. UNCW will be represented by Sigma Nu and Total Chaos in the men's division, and Club Soccer and Panty Rec in the women's division.

Cubans Linked to JFK Assassination

MEXICO CITY—A Cuban television program, "Z-Rifle," has linked two anti-Castro Cubans and three Mafia dons to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. The group is also linked to repeated assassination attempts on Fidel Castro. The Cuban government news agency Prensa Latina reported Saturday that the group was directly responsible for the Kennedy shooting in Dallas.

Welfare Options Considered

WASHINGTON—The Clinton administration is considering paying federal subsidies to companies who hire welfare recipients, as part of a plan to reform the current welfare system. Corporations would receive up to $5000 for each welfare recipient they hire. President Clinton announced a plan to "end welfare as we know it" by limiting benefits to two years. Welfare has grown by 25 percent in the last three years. About $23 billion annually goes to Aid to Families with Dependent Children and $40 billion annually goes to food stamps and Medicaid.

Trade Ministers Iron Out NAFTA

WASHINGTON—Trade ministers from the U.S. and Canada met Monday to resolve differences over the North American Free Trade Agreement. The House of Representatives passed NAFTA two weeks ago but Canada is asking for improvements. Canadian officials said they were leary of heavy-handed U.S. trade practices and wanecler rules on water and energy trade.

Endeavour Lifts Off

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla.—The space shuttle Endeavour lifted off Wednesday morning. Seven astronauts will work for 11 days to fix the Hubble Space Telescope. The orbiting observatory's blurred vision resulted from an improperly ground mirror. Five spacewalks are scheduled for the 11-day flight.

Kevorkian Apartment Raided

ROYAL OAK, Mich.—Authorities raided Dr. Jack Kevorkian's apartment this weekend after hearing an assisted suicide was about to take place. Police say three people entered the apartment, one of whom appeared to be ill. Kevorkian's attorney is asking for $5 million in damages. Police searched the apartment without a warrant. Kevorkian, recently indicted for violating Michigan's law against assisted suicides, is linked to 19 assisted suicides.

ECSU Ouster

ELIZABETH CITY—A group of 26 white business leaders are pushing to oust Elizabeth City State University Chancellor Jimmy Jenkins. Chancellor Jenkins created a rift in August when he told a gathering of faculty and staff that if they didn't like the way things were run at ECSU to hit the road. White faculty members called the statement racist. Tensions are reportedly rising at all five historically black universities as they attempt to enroll more white students. Jenkins has refused to comment.

UNCW Graduates 803 In 47TH Commencement Exercises

UNIVERSITY NEWS BUREAU

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington will award 806 degrees at its 47th commencement exercises at 10 a.m., Saturday, Dec. 4, in Trask Coliseum. Presenting the commencement address will be Dr. Santiago Gangotena, chancellor of the Universidad San Francisco de Quito in Ecuador.

This is the third December commencement to be held at UNCW, a development necessitated by an increasing number of students graduating during summer and fall semesters. Even with two commencements a year, the university has implemented a guest ticketing system due to space limitations in Trask Coliseum. This year, each graduate has been allocated six tickets. Admission is by ticket only. Admission to departmental receptions that follow commencement will be open to all guests.

In this graduating class, some 749 will receive bachelor's degrees while 57 will be awarded graduate degrees. Those graduating in December will include 216 bachelor's candidates and 19 graduate students who graduated during the summer and 533 undergraduate and 38 graduate students who finished at the end of fall semester '93.

In addition to recognizing the graduates, UNCW will honor former Wilmington College Trustees who served from 1958-1969. It was during their term of service that the vision and groundwork were laid for transforming Wilmington College from an associate degree-to baccalaureate degree-granting institution.

The commencement schedule for Saturday, Dec. 4, is as follows:

GRADUATES ROBE and prepare for processional 9:15 a.m.
Hanover Hall (Old Gym)

ACADEMIC PROCESSIONAL IN TRASK COLISEUM 10:00 a.m.

COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES 10-12

DEPARTMENTAL RECEPTIONS will take place at various departments and professional schools at time stated or approximately thirty minutes following the conclusion of commencement exercises. Graduates will receive their diplomas at these receptions.

Nineteen trustees or their representatives have been invited to attend the Dec. 4 commencement to recognize a special anniversary. It was 30 years ago, in the fall of 1963, that Wilmington College achieved senior college status by enrolling its first junior class.

Commencement speaker Gangotena's life revolves around many teaching, administrative and entrepreneurial activities. An Ecuadorian native, Gangotena earned undergraduate and master's degrees in physics from Auburn University in the late 1960's. He received his doctorate in physics from UNC-Chapel Hill in 1977. In addition to teaching physics and math, Gangotena instructs students in mind and physical techniques of yoga. He is also involved in teaching entrepreneurial activities in business and education in the third world.

Gangotena strives to connect higher education to developing countries by serving as the secretary general for the Corporation de Promocion Universitaria, a non-profit institution to promote higher education. Atd, as the founder of the first private university in Ecuador, Universidad San Francisco de Quito, Gangotena has established relations with several American universities such as the University of North Carolina, Boston University, Scripps and Kalamazoo College. The Universidad San Francisco de Quito has grown from 100 students and 12 professors when it opened in September 1988 to its present size of 1,050 students and 200 professors.

Among his many varied entrepreneurial activities, Gangotena had founded the Dhyana Center for yoga and meditation and has had several painting exhibits in Quito and Chapel Hill. He has also started several private corporations ranging from a tourist magazine in 1978, and a graphic communication company, to personnel management and engineering and architectural design companies in 1992.

Also participating in the ceremonies will be William F. Little, vice president of the university representing UNC General Administration; Eunice T. (Bambi) MacRae, chair of the UNCW Board of Trustees; and Ashley T. Wallace, senior class president.

The Student Government Association is saying farewell to their Student Body Vice President Lyn Carney.

Carney is graduating in December and is resigning from her position.

Her replacement is former Senior Class Vice President Jeff Garkin. He will hold this position until March when a new Vice President is elected for next year.

"I have mixed feelings about graduation," said Carney. "I'm ready to finish. Completing a double major in 4 1/2 years has taken a lot out of me. But at the same time, I hate to leave SGA. I will definitely miss the positions I've held in SGA."

Carney first got involved in Student Government her sophomore year when she was elected Senate Secretary. She has also been Junior Class President, Senior Class President, Spring Rep. at Large, and Student Body Vice President.

Student Body President Ziggy Nix said Carney was a "great friend and wonderful co-worker, she will be sorely missed." Nix also said, "Lyn's ability to control the Senate made each Senate meeting more pro-concerning the Student Body more intently. This year Senate is more cohesive and productive than they have been in the past four years."

Frank Tacone, SGA's liaison, said, "Lyn has been very dependable and helpful with tasks that the administration has needed student representation for. She has helped to keep the Senators focused on their purpose."

Garkin, SGA's new Vice President said he is looking forward to continuing the work that Lyn has started.

Good-bye Lyn, you will be greatly missed.

Fair Weather Fans Out Already

O.K., O.K. the Seahawks have started a little slow this year, but please, folks, give them a break. I have all ready heard that the team sucks and aren't nearly as good as last year's team.

This year's team may not achieve the same victory total as last year's team, but I say this team is going to the NCAA by virtue of winning the Colonial Athletic Association tournament in March.

This year's edition of the Seahawks is very inexperienced. There are nine guys on the team that have less than two full years experience on the NCAA level. The other four are seniors Drew Phillips, Sheriff El-Sandilly, Chris Meighen, and John Spahn.

This team is young, but it will win when it becomes more cohesive. Some people will say that every game counts and by losing this early, the team is digging itself a huge hole. Bull hockey.

These are not conference games. The team has lost, and do not affect the team's chances of getting into the NCAA tournament.

Realistically, the only way a team from the CAA gets in is through the CAA tournament.

Thus far, the Seahawks have shot about 38% for the season. I guarantee the team will be shooting near 50% by March. There will be games when the team shoots 60% or higher from the field.

With a front line of Darren Moore, Sheriff, Preston McGriff, Corey Stewart, and Spann, the Seahawks will bully some teams inside all night long.

If teams begin to sag and zone, they will be burned by the outside shoots of Gannon Baker, Meighen, and Phillips.

New to the bench this year and I feel will be a reason the Seahawks fly out West in March will be guards Kenny Avent and Lamont Franklin.

If Phillips gets in foul trouble or needs a break, I don't see much of a let down when either of these two come in. They will need some time to adjust, but come March in Richmond, they will be as integral a part of the team as the two seniors.

This team will win. As Justin Wilson would say, I guarantee.

A Little Control At Last

The controversial Brady Bill, which requires a five-day waiting period and background check on handgun buyers, has become a law. It is the first major gun bill since 1968, when Congress banned mail-order purchases of rifles, shotguns, and ammunition. It is named for James Brady, the White House press secretary who was disabled after being shot in the head in the 1981 assassination attempt against then-President Reagan. The bill has had trouble being passed into law because of conflicting views between gun-control advocates and the National Rifle Association and its congressional supporters.

I, for one, am glad it passed. I believe strongly in the right to bear arms. It's our second amendment for Pete's sake. I think every person should have the capability to defend their homes and families with a gun if they like, but things are getting out of control. A lot of innocent people are wounded and killed every year because of careless gun use. A lot of innocent people are wounded and killed every year in auto accidents as well, but I don't have an argument there.

My reason for saying all of this is not to say that guns are bad. I say it because there are a lot of people in the world who will use guns to take advantage and hurt people. A little over a year ago, I was walking two blocks from my house when I stopped by a man who was looking for the police station because he said his car had been broken into. I gave him directions and wished him luck. As I started to walk away, he stuck a gun in my side and demanded I give him anything I had. I didn't have anything but my keys. No jewelry, no money, nothing. I told him that and he said I had better find something or I would get shot. As it turns out, I got out of it okay. I started to yell for help as loud as I could until he turned and ran. The police couldn't find him of course. So somewhere in my neighborhood there is at least one man with a gun who wants what other people have. That's the best reason I know for a little gun control. Just something to think about.

On a happier note, school is almost done for the holidays. Good luck on exams and congratulations to everyone who graduates Saturday. We actually did have a few letters to the editor this week - Thanks! I'd really like to see more of them. Let us know what you think about the paper. If you like it and think we're doing a good job, thank! If you think we're lousy, give us your suggestions for improvement. Happy Holidays!

Advent has Begun

The Christmas Advent season has begun. Advent means "coming towards" and we are certainly in a "coming towards" time. We are coming towards exams. It is a real time of stress with papers to be completed, reading to be done and tests to be taken. Some are coming towards graduation which carries its own combination of joy and stress when jobs are not readily discovered.

But, in the main, it is the advent of Christmas, a season that takes us back to the ancient days when Hebrew people were looking and waiting for the Deliverer, the Promised one, whom they expected to bring them freedom from the stress of the Roman oppression and personal hopelessness. Wise men from outside Palestine looked into the heavens for a sign of the One to come. Holy men looked into their scriptures. Common folk looked to the places of power. The anticipation of all was focused on the places of wonder and holiness and power.

It behooves us to remember that when the Deliverer did come and was found, it was in the most ordinary places. I hope you will not overlook them. Some very ordinary moments become transformed into times of high holiness through acts of love simply done. Find the housekeeping staff in your dorm, say thank you and see how it feels. Thank a professor when you discover that you have learned something new. Look at your friends one by one, figure out one thing you appreciate about them and tell them. Find the cafeteria staff and tell them about what you did like. Write down ten things you do like about yourself and celebrate. Stop a policeman and tell them that you appreciate them. If love lives in you, wrap it in swaddling clothes, the ordinary stuff of life, and give it to someone.

Every time you do, you will be taking a short, quick journey to the Holy place deep inside each one of us. Such little acts of love feel good because they touch our own loving center. And, perhaps, during the stress of exams and in the midst of whatever other anxiety is affecting us, what to remind ourselves that we had needed almost 2,000 years ago is irrelevant unless there is a Holy, loving place within us. Let part of your advent journey be a new "coming towards" your deeper, holier self.

Letter To The Editor:
Butter, Butter, Butter

"You don't have to know how to do it. Just memorize the questions, and you'll get an A for the course," said one student to another. Excuse me for eavesdropping, but this was a comment I heard about another student who was dismayed by her lack of comprehension of the required subjects matter in a mathematics course.

As the scenario continues, it was pointed out to the concerned student that her lack of ability should not affect her course grade, because the questions on each exam were given prior to the test, and therefore only required simple memorization of the answers to score highly. The comment I overheard was, "What are you worried about - just memorize the answers to the given problems and you're sure to get an A." Well, there may be some at the university who feel there is nothing wrong with this, but hopefully this is not a course policy which the university condones.

In last week's issue of the Seahawk, there was a reprint from the Wilmington Star-News about the issue of teaching standards at the UNC system. In case you missed it, basically it said that there needs to be efforts put forth to improve the level of teaching in our universities, and has instructed Chancellor Lestae and other chancellors to "review mission statements and tenure policies at the institutions to insure the primary importance of teaching."

Actually, the juggling of teaching, research and community service that professors perform appears to be a national problem, and certainly not exclusive to UNCW. But, due to the fact that this problem is widespread, are we to be less concerned? I hope not!! Remember, we students are the primary customers and bill-payers of this university, and should be treated accordingly.

With these thoughts in mind, I wish to make a suggestion to the Seahawk newspaper. Take some responsibility for the important issues which face the students at UNCW, and like any formidable newspaper, put every story in its proper perspective. By this I mean, put the important issues on the front page, and news about "story tellers" somewhere else. We, as students of UNCW pay for your paper and ink, and deserve to be treated as if we matter. Rather than waste paper and ink ridiculing students who take an interest in their school and their community, I would hope that you would, as professionally run papers do, welcome and cherish the views of your readers.

In closing, I encourage the Seahawk to rededicate itself to addressing the concerns and issues that effect students at UNCW, (that means all students, whether you agree with them or not). This newspaper should act as a leader, not a follower, and shine light on real issues of school improvement. I suggest that some time be spent over the winter break consider why this newspaper exists, and what purpose it serves.

I don't know if the Seahawk newspaper has a statement of mission, but if not, please think about giving it one. And after a mission statement has been drafted, perhaps it would be a good idea to print it on the front page of each paper to remind all at the university why you're here. Remember, if all you print is butter, butter, butter - this university will never get better, better, better! Happy holidays to all!

How's This For A Thesis?

WASHINGTON—How's this for a thesis: Rewards—whether gold stars, bonuses or praise—don't produce better children, better workers or better citizens. Better to abandon such attempts at bribery and let virtue be its own required.

The giant sucking sound is my own started gasp. I happened upon Alfie Kohn's latest book, "Punished by Rewards," just as I was about to propose (what else?) a new set rewards.

Let me begin with Kohn's idea and then see if I still have the nerve to present my own. Kohn begins by acknowledging the persuasiveness both of rewards and of the belief in their efficacy. "We are deeply committed to this way of thinking and behaving," he says. "But...I want to argue that there is something profoundly wrongheaded about this doctrine—that its assumptions are misleading—and that the practices it generates are both intrinsically objectionable and counterproductive."

Kohn, whose previous works include "No Context" and who has made a reputation by preaching the great harm that comes from competition, in work and in play, argues in his new book (Houghton Mifflin) that rewards distract us from higher goals to craves and subordinate ones. We focus on the lollipop (or the Hawaii vacation) rather than on spelling or improving the health of the company. Worse, except in the very short term, it doesn't work. Rewards just don't motivate.

I follow Kohn's ideas and illustrations easily enough; his anecdotes seem real; I've seen people respond the way he describes.

But I've also seen—and so have you—clear evidence of that psychological truism: You get more of what you reward and less of what you punish. Can Kohn's observations and our seemingly contradictory ones be true?

I think so. It may be true that a $3 million a year NFL running back won't run any harder if his pay is raised to $4 million. But the rookie does seem to respond to incentive clauses in his contract and, more to the point, players who believe they are not properly rewarded for their contributions tend at first to try harder and then to stop trying. What is true for incentive clauses is true in varying degrees for merit badges, official honors or peer approval.

Which brings me to my idea. We talk incessantly about the despair that characterizes the inner cities, the indictment of drug money and the temptation to all sorts of illicit behavior. What we don't talk much about is that there are rewards—financial and psycho—for the behavior we deplore. The clever drug dealers make money. The young defiance celebrated by their peers. The fighters, whether with fists or guns, are respected by people whose names they cannot call.

Those are substantial rewards, which we try to counter with punishment—longer jail sentences, for instance.

Why don't we try countering the lures of crime with rewards of our own? The tendency now is to focus on the offenders (an element of their reward structure, no doubt) and to ignore those youngsters who try, however tentatively, to do what we say they ought to do.

We tend to forget there are such youngsters out there, and nobody reminds us because they thing we don't care. Yet, even in the worst schools some children make the honor role. No neighborhood is so far gone but that some youngsters don't go out of their way to be helpful. In the very worst places there are community leaders and church workers and tutors and learners. There are class leaders and volunteers and peacemakers and kids with perfect attendance. What's wrong with rewarding them?

The rewards I have in mind can be as large or as small as the resources of the sponsors dictate: from T-shirts to books to sneakers to visits to theme parks. I'd go further and let the children themselves select both the rewards and the criteria for earning them. I would, in effect, ask the children we describe as "at risk" what we might do to compete with the forces that are drawing them to their destruction. Astonishingly, we haven't done it—have not even thought of doing it—and the result is the forfeiture of that which ought to be dearest to us: our children.

There are exceptions. The "I Have a Dream" program offers guaranteed college tuition for some pre-selected youngsters who make it through high school, and there are a few honors and recognition's for some other special children. But mostly we reward, without our attention, what we most fear—and punish, with our neglect, those things we want more of.

I wonder what Alfie Kohn thinks of that.

George Will

Seattle, a 35 Billion Dollar Jewel

SEATTLE—In October 1900, when this was a raw town of 80,000, across the continent in Cambridge, Mass., a Harvard philosopher, George Santayana, addressed an undergraduate literary club, delivering a pointed poem. "Young Sam's First Wild Out," which began:

Mid Uncle Sam's expanded acres
There's an old, secluded glade
Where gray Puritans and Quakers
Still grow fervid in the shade;
And the same great elms and beeches
That once graced the ancestral farm,
Bending to the old men's speeches,
Lend their words and echo's charm.
Laurel, climatic, and vice Weave green trellises about,
And three maples and a pine
Shut the mucker-village out.
Yet the smoke of trade and battle
Cannot quite be banished hence,
And the air-line to Seattle
Whizzes just behind the fence.

Back, then before the birth of Seattle's Boeing corporation, and "air-line" was a fast train. In Santayana's poem, such a train symbolized the mingling of booming commerce and imperial politics which much of Harvard's faculty considered unsavory ("mucker-village") and immoral. McKim's re-election campaign and the angry debate about Philippines-America's acquisition of Pacific empire were boiling along. Santayana was indicting people whose politics amounted, he believed, to a fool's wish that the world would spin another way.

Today protectionism is a popular form of wishful thinking—more popular and durable than many complacent people think now that NAFTA has been approved. But protectionism can't deflect the forces that have turned this nation's attention to the ocean on the left side of the continent.

When Secretary of State Warren Christopher says "Eurocentric" policies are anachronistic because "Western Europe is no longer the dominant area of the world," his words express what the president's behavior expresses. Clinton has not been to Paris, London or Bonn but has been to Tokyo and Seoul.

The Asian orientation of U.S. policy is partly a result of Europe's decadence. Just two years ago there was much dreamy rhetoric about "Euro 1992" ushering in a new age. But 1992 came and went and in 1993 old Europe is paralyzed about ethnic cleansing, mean spirited toward emerging democracies and market economies to the west, and stagnates beneath bloated welfare states. And American exports to Asia exceed those to Europe.

Twenty percent of all jobs in Seattle, which is a sailing day closer to Japan than Los Angeles is, are involved in trade. Last year the state of Washington exported $33.5 billion worth of its products, from apples and timber to aircraft and software.

Boeing's exports to Asia last year earned $5 billion. By 2010 China, which last year bought one of every six aircraft Boeing made, will need $40 billion worth of aircraft—800 aircraft in 17 years.

Seattle's Microsoft corporation says revenues from the Asian nations represented at last week's APEC conference are growing 60 percent a year, twice as fast as revenues from Europe or America.

Today, 209 years after the first American ship—the Empress of China—sailed from New York to Asia, patterns of trade are infuriatingly perplexing to people eager to understand the world in terms of a tidy-us-versus-them dichotomy. For example, Taiwan's largest exporter of electronic equipment is AT&T. The absence of clarity encourages a politics of anxiety and a continuing quest for protection.

Sixty percent of House Democrats opposed NAFTA, which would not have passed if a Republican leader, Lame Kinkaid, head of the AFL-CIO, has a better head on his shoulders than sits on 99 percent of Washington shoulders, and he has a caninness that deserves a better cause. He has demonstrated that a huge, diverse constituency, animated by both economic interests and cultural concerns, can be mobilized against free trade.

But, you say, does not the NAFTA vote reflect the strength of free-trade principles? Hardly. The truth is in the vignette:

As the NAFTA vote drew near, a pro-NAFTA Republican approached a fence-sitting Florida Republican and said, hopefully: "We seem to have solved your problem about sugar and citrus." The fence-sitter replied with one word: "Tomatoes." Principled believers in free trade were a minority in the pro-NAFTA majority.

So, as the argument about protectionism continues, proponents of free trade would do well to stress a certain kinship between America and its trading partners along the Pacific rim. In their overflying energy and their often raw practices, including their protectionism that they must outgrow, the Asian nations resemble America in the post-Civil War "glided age," when roaring steel mills made the rails over which whizzed the air-line to Seattle.

Twas The Night Before Finals

First off this week, a bit of local law enforcement news, and it doesn't even involve our beloved Campus Police Squad. It actually involves a unit of the Wilmington Police Force. You see, I was pulled the other night for— would you believe—HONKING MY HORN! Yes Wilmingtonians, it appears that it is illegal to honk the horn on your car after 10:00 pm. I was on Pine Grove Drive when I came upon SGA President Ziggy Nix. Being the kind-hearted and friendly sort of columnist I am, I honked my horn at him and waved. The next thing I knew, I was surrounded by a swarm of the fifteen or so different style police cars Wilmington has. Actually it was only one car, but you get the picture. After interrogating me and threatening to "haul me in," the officer let me go. I did not get his name, but if you happen to bump into an officer with badge #92, DO NOT HONK YOUR HORN. Perhaps you can catch me in the next edition of Cape Fear Cops which runs just before David Letterman on our fine CBS affiliate WJOE (Bad boys, Bad Boys... whatcha gonna do?).

Well friends, it has come that time of the year again. You are all familiar with this time of the year, when people actually go to the library and actually show up for a class to find out when the final exam is. At least this time I do know about (to the week) when mine are. It is that time of year when we increase our pencil collections (i.e. evaluations) and prepare for that most dreaded of all university phenomena... FINAL EXAMS.

I was looking back over last year's pre-Christmas issue, and the hell at thing was the "Magic Potty Baby" that was hitting the shelves. I'm glad that they haven't come out with anything like that this year, unless you count that hideous purple dinosaur thing I've seen dancing around on television. By the way, I consider it my duty to remind all college students that there are only about twenty more shoplifting days until Christmas. Perhaps you will be as creative as I was last year and get all of your shopping done at Walmart between 2:00 and 4:00 am on Christmas eve morning.

While I was rummaging through columns of old, I came across a NoBull prize winning piece from the December 4, 1991 issue of The Fishwrapper entitled "Twas The Night Before Finals." I was particularly fond of that issue and since this is my last pre-, I have decided to do somewhat of a remake. It's kind of ment, "Twas The Night Before Finals," by NoBull Prize winning columnist Phil Smith.

Again I say "Hat's Off" for a job well done. Special thanks also to go this week to all of the faithful, semi-coherent readers who make this a fun thing for me to do. A special word to Andy Kraft (not of the Cheese people), Peter Kerstetter, Vince Bowman (lab partner and master fruitfly breeder), Ivey Graham, Jody Dixon, Neal Leeper's Dad, Melissa Willis, Larry Ferrell, Dawn Boone, Jill, Peggy, Nicki, my friends out at Quality Analytical Services, and many many (actually thousands) more. Eli Wolfe, your day will come.

Well, that about wraps things up for this edition, as well as this year. Look for me again in January for my final semester here at Seahawk High. You may have to do some hunting, as I may or may not be using my new pen name. I wish you all a safe and happy Christmas season. Until next year... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet. Phil Smith is a NoBull Prize winning columnist with The Seahawk, and he may again be eating Ho-Cake during the Christmas break.

I'm The Entertainment Of The Day

Christmas is soon upon us and visions of bright red bows on new ski boots and oddly packaged skis under the tree fill day dreams—for some of you. I have that up there ago.

When my once-upon-a-time husband and I lived in Berlin, we decided to take ski lessons in Garmisch-Partenkirchen in what used to be West Germany. Because we lived in West Berlin, at that time an occupied city, we had to ride the Freedom Train through what was called the Zone. This meant that at the border of West Berlin we stopped and a new engine owned by the East Germans replaced our train engine. The process was repeated at the border to West Germany with a West German engine. It was a tedious and silly process and we were restricted to traveling at night.

Finally arriving at the General Patton Hotel, we dumped our bags and headed for the ski slopes and our first ski lesson. Everything looked like a fairy tale: cute little flower-decked chalets, horse-drawn beer wagons, snow-covered fields and mountains, the whole scene satisfying to any dreamy-eyed tourist—meaning me.

At the ski lodge, we're divided into various skill levels. My husband and I were assigned to the beginners' group. I knew I'd soon be schussing along dazzling everyone with my prowess on the slopes. The beginners were divided into two more groups, wives separated from husbands. When I complained (I was in love at the time), the instructors explained that marital fights had become so predominant they had to separate the couples.

Apparently husbands were eyeing the other women.

Our first lesson began with the demonstration of how to hold your ski poles while walking to the slope. We were directed to practice this while walking across the parking lot to the beginner slope. Our enthusiasm was dimmed a little when we eyed the so-called beginner slope and saw nothing but children about three years-old schussing or whatever-you-call-it like experts down what definitely appeared to be a cliff—a large cliff.

Resigned to our fates, we head out across the parking lot. I'm hopping along, simultaneously trying to lift one heavy ski boot at a time like a duck in galoshes and look semi-sophisticated. I'm carrying the ski poles as instructed, holding them in one hand and balancing them across my right shoulder. I'm checking out everyone else's outfits, thinking hey.

Half way across the parking lot a bus packed with tourists suddenly comes skidding towards me. My ski boot finds a convenient ice slick and I go sliding across the parking lot, coming to an abrupt stop in front of the bumper of the now stopped bus. There I am, flat on my back, the smell of smoking tires in my nostrils and the pale blue sky above me.

Five zillion people come pouring off the bus. The ski instructor runs over, the ski class hauls their nosy little butts over and I'm surrounded, my view of the sky exchanged for a panorama of shocked faces.

My right hand's hurting like hell and I try to sit up. One woman grabs my injured hand to help me up and I scream, my hand feels as if it's on fire.

She grabs my other hand, leans over, and as she pulls me up, stubs me in the middle of my forehead with her bloody ski pole.

Finally I'm standing. My right hand is throbbing and now I'm sure I have a hole in my forehead. The ski instructor takes off my right glove. "Mein Gott," she yells. "Call the ski patrol."

This scares me to death. I peer over her hand to see what's so awful. I find I'm now the unfortunate owner of what appears to be a milk-laden cow's belly with five little stubby teats emerging from the swollen mass. My hand is a mess. The ski patrol shows up, puts me in a jeep and whisks me off to the Army dispensary. My audience of voyeurs waves. I'm the entertainment of the day.

At the dispensary I'm x-rayed and otherwise poked and prodded. My hand's broken in five places with my middle finger being crushed by the ski poles I was so proudly carrying as instructed. The doctor says this is the first parking lot injury they've ever had. I'm casted and the doctor sends me on my way with the admonition not to ski. What does he mean, ski? I never even made it out of the parking lot.

That was the beginning of the non-ski week from hell (the rest of my nightmare week will have to wait till a future date). I've not been skiing since. My sugar-plum visions definitely do not include ski equipment for Christmas. However, now that I'm divorced, I wouldn't mind one of those good-looking ski patrol guys hanging out under my mistletoe.

Letter to the Editor: Can You Say Bike Paths???

This article is in response to the "Bicycles, Phones Are Safety Committee Concerns" article, published in the Vol. II, No. 2, December 1993 HyperActive newsletter. Also are some of my own personal feelings concerning the topic of bicycle safety on campus. The HyperActive article was in reference to a Chancellor's Safety Committee meeting which had been held on Nov. 17. At the meeting, bicycle safety, crosswalks, skateboards and rollerblades were the dominant topics.

I would assume that everyone has their own opinions concerning bike safety, which most likely stem from some specific incidents you've been involved with. These are some of my opinions: sidewalks are for walking, hence the term. I hate walking along a sidewalk and at a sudden I hear something behind me. Before I can turn around to see what it is someone flies by me on a bike. What if all of a sudden I was to change directions on that sidewalk. I could get run over. Another thing, when I'm driving, I have no problem yielding to a pedestrian walking across a crosswalk, but when you're on a bike, you're not a pedestrian and I'm not gonna stop.

According to the article, "poor knowledge of state laws relating to bicycles were the major cause of accidents." So on that note here is a brief run down:

Spelunking in Wild West Virginia

Matt Jorgenson
Entertainment Writer

Several weekends ago, I was able to go on an incredible trip. I went to West Virginia for a weekend of spelunking with the North Carolina Caving Society (NCCS). Without a doubt, besides getting a tan, this is the most addicting activity. Once we went into the first cavern, I knew the weekend would be incredible before we went into the first cavern, we walked through a commercial cavern to get an idea of the formations we'd see in the others. The first cavern we went into was named Morhucan Cavern. This one was hard core!! From the very start, this one was a billy crawler.

We had to slither over muddy boulders and slide under new ceilings. One room was so intense, we had to lay down sideways and roll through it. The two-foot tall room contained dozens of stalactites and even several columns (stalactites and stalagmites that join in the center). At the end of the main passage, our whole group cut off all the lights and experienced True Darkness. The cave was so black that I could not see my hand moving across the tip of my nose. On our way back up the main cavern our group of 17 broke into smaller groups and explored several side passages. My adrenaline was in overdrive as I had to pick my way through the passage. Most side passages connect back to the main one and soon, we had all grooves and left the cave, coated in mud from head to toe.

We hit a fast food place for lunch and were quickly headed for another cavern, much to the dismay of many native West Virginians who still believe their Wendy's Restaurant was invaded by a pack of Sasquatch.

The next cavern, Jewell, was not so much crawling on bellies, but it was a lot of walking in water. About 1/2 of the cave was ankle to thigh deep in water. At one dead end was a pool large enough for a couple of spelunkers to jump in. Despite the constant temperature of 52 degrees, the movement and exertion we put out kept us warm. After spending the afternoon in Jewell, we headed back for the campsite. I had successfully explored two caves and, as we all sat around the fire that night, I realized I was hooked on caving.

Luckily for you readers, you can take part in this most incredible experience too. The North Carolina Caving Society is constantly taking trips to West Virginia to go caving. It makes for a perfect weekend getaway and you don't have to be a member to sign up. Actually, just by going on a trip, you become a member of the society.

The organizer of the society, Christopher Brumfield, is always after the ultimate cavern and he usually takes a group of about fifteen people along to share the experience. In the past, Mr. Brumfield and the N.C.C.S. have travelled in the 33rd largest cave in the U.S. The Bone-Norman System provides the group with almost eight hours of fun as they explored most of the 14.1 mile long system. In the near future, the N.C.C.S. is planning a trip to the 3rd largest cave in the U.S. The 39.5 mile long Organ-Lips System is tentatively scheduled for one of the two trips already scheduled for the weekends of January 7-9 and January 21-23.

The trips are open to all but, spaces are limited, so it is important to sign up in order to go. Anyone can sign up or just get more information on the N.C.C.S., and its trips by calling Christopher Brumfield at 392-6869 or by contacting Jessica Barrett at 392-8110. The cost for the trip is $40-45 for camping facilities, camping gear (a tent, lanterns, stove, etc.), caving equipment and tour guide services. You'll also need a few extra dollars to split gas on the trip and to buy food (about another 15-25 dollars at the most). Here's hoping we'll see you on one of the trips very soon!

Where The Heart Is

Jack Cassidy
Entertainment Writer

You can't go home again. A fact that Thomas Wolfe once found out the hard way. A fact that Michael Jordan lived with a couple of weeks ago when he was in town.

Michael returned to the city of his youth only to find that it had become just like everywhere else he goes. Even here, in a town that deals with celebrities on a regular basis, Mike is still an attraction to people. I observed several hundred people one night in a local bar who "just wanted to shake his hand," others who "just wanted to talk to him," and still others who "wanted to buy him a drink." Let me say this about Michael Jordan and it may come as a shock to some of you: Michael is human.

He has emotions and feelings just like you. He cries, he laughs, he gets angry, he loves, just like you and me. He is a person and deserves to be treated like one. When he is on the court his is an attraction. You pay money to see him do things you wish you could do. Off the court he is a man, a person, who just wants to be like everyone else. We all want to go out with old friends sometimes. Why can't Mike do it without all of you bugging the shit out of him? Do Mike a favor next time - let him have a little bit of privacy. Doesn't the greatest basketball player ever deserve at least a little bit of your understanding?

And while we are on the topic of going home; what is all this mess about Michael Jackson. Why doesn't he come home? I'll tell you why. Michael Jackson has already been convicted. The media has already hyped these allegations so much that many people believe Jackson might be guilty. There has not even been any evidence produced, only accusations. What ever happened to innocent until proven guilty?

I know there are lots of strange circumstances going on around this case. But we are talking about Michael Jackson, he isn't exactly the most normal guy you know. Didn't he try and buy s, somebody's bones once? Does that make these accusations any more valid? No, it doesn't, and it shouldn't, that's why the police are taking their time with this case. When they can prove something they will let us know. In the meantime, isn't there anything else more newsworthy?

Finally, continuing on our topic of "you can't go home again," did anyone else have a boring Thanksgiving holiday? Everything is so predictably mundane when I go home. I mean it's good to see my family and all I, and I know that I have a lot to be thankful for but, couldn't it all have been a little more exciting? Televised parades and cranberry sauce are not that entertaining. Neither are the same old people living their same old lives telling their same old stories. Just let me out before I go crazy?

On a final note, let me say that it was good seeing old friends. Let me wish all those new friends I have made in my years here a fond farewell. This time I am truly on my way out the door, ready to take on the world and willing to fight for what I believe in every step of the way.

Degree In Three Years Possible? Commencement Should Symbolize The End

BY SUNNIDENICOLA
Special Correspondent
College Press Service

If you could graduate college in three years instead of four, saving a quarter of your total bill, would you? Seventy-seven percent of high school students said yes in a recent study.

With college being second only to the purchase of a home as the biggest expense a family faces, many students and parents are beginning to inquire about this option. Several institutions are also examining the three-year degree as one strategy in meeting the enrollment and fiscal challenges they face.

Of course, the accelerated degree is not new. It has existed at most schools for some time, but only a small percentage of students took advantage of it, perhaps because a three-year degree also means working hard and abandoning activities such as sports, social organizations, student government, internships and part-time jobs.

But some officials think this low participation is due to programs not being formalized or advertised in college catalogues. Often, shortened programs were strictly for gifted students, or for more enterprising students to work out on their own. Now, with skyrocketing college costs, students may reconsider.

S. Frederick Starr, president of Oberlin College in Ohio, and one of the first administrators to advocate a three-year degree, sees it as an option for students who otherwise might not be able to afford to get a college degree. He estimates that eliminating one year of college could reduce costs by 25 percent, or 40 percent if potential income is factored in for the fourth year.

"This plan actually reduces the cost of a B.A.," he said. "Everything else, so far, simply decreases the rate of increase."

Starr said he sees student demand for this program growing, citing the boom in Advanced Placement (AP) testing as an indicator. The test allows high school students to earn college credits. In 1993, 639,000 students took APs, an increase of 60,000 over the previous year and the largest increase this decade.

In addition, Starr points to the survey of 2,000 high school students nationwide by George Dehne & Associates. Seventy-seven percent said they would want to attend a university offering a three-year degree, a 43 percent increase from the same survey question in 1983.

But four is still the magic number for most educators. The United States adopted the four-year degree from England when Harvard University was founded in 1636. However, England and other European countries have long since changed to a three-year baccalaureate, and supporters of the three-year degree say it is time the United States does the same.

Critics say the current European system shouldn't be compared with this nation's because of the state of secondary schools here, evidenced by the growing need for high school remedial work and declining SAT scores.

"European students come to college with a much higher level of preparation and specialization than in the U.S., and that is not likely to change in the next few years," Cornell University President Frank Rhodes told the San Francisco Chronicle.

Starr, however, says there are a "surprising number of high schools doing an excellent job," and working with these high schools could help the students reach their goal of graduating from college in a shorter period of time. He did agree, however, that there is not time for high school academic remedial work in an accelerated plan.

Students would begin the three-year degree in high school, taking stringent college prep courses and AP tests, under a plan suggested by Starr. Additional college credits might be earned through a dual enrollment arrangement where both high school and college-level courses are taken.

Once in college, students would choose a major in their first year and enroll in overload courses. They could also attend summer terms, which would be an obstacle for those needing to work.

The most controversial issue involves whether general education requirements should be reduced. Starr said some colleges may need to "trim the fat" from their curriculum.

"Often innovations in American education become instantly standardized and imposed across widely differing schools without respect to their particular mission," Starr said. "I think you have to ask the core question of education, 'what is most worth knowing?'"

Critics say this flies in the face of what higher education is about.

Dartmouth College President James O. Freedman told The Chronicle of Higher Education that "students mature so much between the ages of 17 and 22 that they would lose a lot if we took away a year. Students should explore a lot of things; they should have a sense of progression, and they should have a sense of mastery."

Vartan Gregorian, president of Brown University in Rhode Island, said that the "knowledge explosion" has been so great that students should take five years to earn an undergraduate degree. In an interview with the San Francisco Chronicle, Gregorian said, "This (three-year degree) is driven by economics, not educational quality."

He added that a shorter program would lead to sketchy knowledge of key subjects that provide "education information," but not knowledge. "Otherwise, you can stay at home and read the Encyclopedia Britannica, which costs only $600, and take a test at the end," he said.

Nevertheless, some schools are venturing into reducing the amount of time to get an undergraduate degree.

Albertus Magnus College, a liberal arts college in New Haven, Conn., began a three-year program this fall. Curriculum requirements were not changed, but the academic calendar was compressed into three, 13-week semesters, said college spokesman Robert Cole.

Like many private schools, Albertus Magnus has been losing students to less expensive state institutions. College officials hope that this degree may reverse a trend through financial incentives by reducing charges for tuition and room and board when students are enrolled in a third consecutive session. Students will save about $11,000 by graduation.

"We have gotten an excellent response," Cole said, saying that 75 percent of returning students and 80 percent of incoming freshmen opted for the three-year plan.

Meanwhile, public university systems, including those in California, New York and Virginia, are examining a three-year program as a way of addressing increased enrollment and decreased funding by streamlining the degree process.

Starr does not agree that the program is for all students, as he wrote in a New York Times editorial: "This program would be intensive and hardly appropriate for those wishing to supplement their academic diet with lightweight courses and afternoons on the fraternity porch with a six-pack."

Parties will be thrown in their honor, they will receive extraordinary gifts from family members, and they will walk with the knowledge that after the fun ceases there will still be another week of finals to go. As graduation rolls around, seniors at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington anticipate the excitement of completing their college career. Their commencement will be held on December 4, 1993 at 10:00 a.m. in Trask Coliseum on the University campus.

The final exams at the University take place the following week continuing until the 13th of December. A senior may go through the motion of the graduation ceremony, but if he/she fails the final exam they may not receive their diploma, which arrives in the mail sometime during the months of January or February.

The proudest moment of a student's college career has become a complete hoax. In front of their family and friends they are given a fake honor of the college degree. During the ceremony the students receive a blank sheet of paper rolled in tube formation and tied with a ribbon symbolizing the receipt of a diploma.

Many seniors have requested that the school move the graduation after the scheduled exams, even begin school earlier in the fall in order to accommodate their request. The faculty and administration argue that delaying the ceremony will cause it to run to close to Christmas break, and if school is started earlier it will cut the summer break shorter. The administration feels that the ratio of students who will pass their finals far outweighs those who won't. Also, after walking in the ceremony, this will give the seniors the incentive to try harder in order to pass their finals. With graduation being held before finals many students feel that significance of the ceremony has been lost. The University has essentially told the students that they should be thankful and appreciative the University holds a walking ceremony in December since many universities of its size only have the single commencement in May.

Commencement means commemorating a great milestone and stepping forward into a new journey. This ceremony should symbolize the closing of the end. Not one more week of finals and then we're through.

the pedestrian mall at the front of the campus.

Section 3. GENERAL REGULATIONS

Operators of bicycles and mopeds must abide by the rules of Article V when riding on campus streets. (These include all vehicle traffic laws, i.e. speed limits, stopping, yielding, etc.)

Article X: PEDESTRIANS
Section 1. PEDESTRIAN RIGHT OF WAY

Pedestrians shall be given the right of way by any operator of motor vehicle, moped or bicycle.

Now that you are aware of the laws, let's get down to the true major cause of bicycle accidents. WE HAVE NO BIKE PATHS. I don't know who failed to make provisions for bicycle transportation throughout the campus during the planning stages, but these people need to WAKE UP and OPEN THEIR EYES. Bikers are everywhere and studies show that biking is trend which is continually growing.

In the Recreation Profession we refer to bike paths as "linear parks". These linear parks can accommodate our recreational needs as well as our transportation needs, not to mention the fact that they would help cut down on pollution. I mention the fact that they would help cut down on pollution. I thought it was odd that nowhere in the "Bike Safety Concerns" article was there mention of implementing bike paths as a possible solution to the accident problem.

I assume that more people would choose to bike to school if there was a safe and efficient bike path system implemented onto the campus. I've heard that this would be an expensive renovation project, but think of the long term costs of not having such a system. With the high growth rate of student population adding to the already overly congested campus roads, intersections and parking lots how can we afford not to invest. Maybe the University itself should be held liable for bike related accidents for failing to provide the proper facilities for the needs of the student population.

New Hanover County has a zero percent sufficiency rating for the provision of bike trails and the county recently shot down a proposal for acquiring six-miles of abandoned railroad track that could have, very easily and cheaply, been converted into a linear park. Sure we're kind of behind the times here in Wilmington, but we students at UNCW aren't. Most of us understand the wants, needs and trends around the nation. So bikers unite, skaters and rollerbladers as well. You wheel people need to be heard. Go to the Chancellor's Safety Committee meetings, the SGA meetings. Talk to University officials, SGA representatives and your friends. If you don't demand your paths you will continue to be charged with ignorance.

Will You Get a Job?

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

BETHLEHEM, Pa.—Although companies are doing less recruiting on college campuses this academic year, many employers are anticipating a better year than last year, the College Placement Council said.

According to the council's Job

Many firms, however, do not plan on active recruiting on campus, according to the survey. Responding was described in the survey as a "buyer's market" for employers, and that low inflation, coupled with a tight job market, kept increasing in starting salaries low.

Bookstores Need To Change Imagine, Group Says

BY COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

College bookstores need to repair their tarnished images in the eyes of students who are angry about the high price of textbooks and believe the bookstores are making a killing off sales, an association recommended.

The National Association of College Stores, based in Oberlin, Ohio, conducted a series of focus groups with more than 60 college students throughout the United States over the summer. The students, from a variety of schools, majors and backgrounds, were asked to share their experiences with textbook purchases and buy-backs, how faculty used the course materials that students were required to buy, their use of computers and other topics.

"Students are almost universally concerned, and many are angry, about the price of books," the association reported in its Oct. 29 newsletter. "They don't understand the transactions and relationships between publishers, faculty and the store. They suspect that bookstores and publishers conspire to make a profit at their expense."

NACS said bookstores need to "convince students that they are their advocate, not adversary, by actively promoting store efforts to keep prices down, such as by obtaining as many used books as possible."

NACS also recommended that bookstores work to make first-year students aware of their pricing policies before they make their first textbook purchases, because that's when students' attitudes are formed. "Students' lifetime attitude about textbooks and book prices begins during their first semester buying experience, when they 'naively' buy all of the required books, suffer 'sticker shock' at the prices and then discover they didn't need all of the books in the first place," the newsletter said.

Other problems occur when schools fail to give students basic information about college bookstores and when faculty members don't explain or try to justify the textbooks they require, NACS said. Bookstores also should get more actively involved in orientation sessions in which store representatives can explain directly to students why textbooks cost as much as they do.

"Students believe that textbooks are overpriced and that the store is making a large profit from their sale. This creates the perception that the other products sold by the store are also overpriced. Some students talked about how they go out of their way to avoid buying from their college store. They are certain off-campus stores are less expensive, although they can't cite much proof," NACS said.

Health Reform Must Be Fiscally Sound

BY COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

NEW YORK—As Congress scrutinizes President Clinton's health care plan, Third Millennium issues a plea to lawmakers in both political parties: Pay for today's health care reform today. Do not pass the bill to future generations.

As it now stands, the president's current proposal will provide a short-term windfall for older Americans by hammering future generations. The first sock-it-to-the-future provision is an early retirement subsidy that would pay 80 percent of the health care premiums for people who retire between the ages of 55 and 64. The second is "community rating" which mandates that everybody—young and old, fit and unfit—pays the same health-insurance premium.

Under Clinton's plan, the government will pay 80 percent of the health care premiums for people who retire early. This amount to another massive middle- and upper-class entitlement program that may cost more than $10 billion per year. Amazingly, this brand-new entitlement program is not tested; it will benefit rich and poor at the expense of future generations. Is there any reason for taxpayers to subsidize the medical bills of executives who decide to leave their offices and step onto the golf course a few years earlier?

The biggest problem with the early retirement subsidy is that it most likely will be a budget buster, adding to the deficit and thereby forcing future generations to shoulder the costs. As U.S. Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, (D-N.Y.), said, the proposed financing of Clinton's health care plan is "fantasy." The cost of the early retirement subsidy will grow dramatically as members of the Baby Boom generation approach retirement age, putting millions more on the government dole.

The Clinton administration's health care sales team has been quite candid about the reason for the early retirement provision: It is an effort to win the support of the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP), one of America's most powerful special-interest lobbies. The strategy is working. As AARP spokesman John Rother explained, "It's a great deal."

But younger Americans must brace for the immediate consequences of another provision of Clinton's health care plan: "community rating."

Clinton has proposed community rating as a way to equalize the price of health care, thereby making it cost the same for everybody, regardless of age or medical history. This may sound fine in theory, but in practice it forces the young (who have the least amount of disposable income) to subsidize the health care of the middle-aged (who are at the peak of their earning power).

This was made painfully clear in New York state, which this year instituted the country's most rigid community rating plan. Most young New Yorkers saw their health care premiums skyrocket. For example, before community rating, the average 30-year-old single male paid an annual premium of $1,200; after the change, his premium soared to $3,240, according to the New York Insurance Department. Likewise, young families saw their premiums nearly double.

The only age group that benefited from the changes in New York was the over-50 bracket. For example, the average 60-year-old male saw his annual premiums go from $5,880 to $3,240, a decrease of nearly 50 percent. But the cost of reducing the premiums for the wealthiest segment of the population was high: It put the price of health care out of reach for many young New Yorkers just entering the workforce.

Third Millennium believes that young Americans are willing to sacrifice to build a better future, but the president's health plan requires disproportionate sacrifice for younger Americans without providing a fiscally sound system for the future.

Politicians in both parties have concluded that the interests of future generations can be trampled upon because young Americans are not organized lobbying forces. As Republican pollster Bill McInturff told The Wall Street Journal, "People under 35 don't participate, they don't vote, and they're not well organized."

Don't be so sure. By 1998, Americans born after 1960 will be the largest voting block in America, and we will not stand by silently if the political establishment continues to sell out the future.

the quality of teaching in the 15-campus UNC system, Coble said. The legislature also set up a study commission to evaluate the quality of undergraduate education, and will report the results to the General Assembly in 1995. The Board of Governors has considered the center's recommendations for awarding good teaching.

However, three institutions in the system are moving ahead, Coble said. The center credits UNC Wilmington, Western Carolina and UNC-Chapel Hill with strong efforts to improve teaching. According to Coble, James Leutze is the only chancellor in the system who has said teaching is important and plans to emphasize and improve it.

To recognize good teaching, UNCW awards four distinguished professorships annually, which carry a $5,000 stipend. The Board of Trustees gives one teaching excellence award annually, with a $1,500 stipend. Five Chancellor's awards are given, each carrying a $500 stipend. The Student Government Association also gives a teaching excellence award, with the winner's name inscribed on a plaque.

Coble said that, compared with other schools in the UNC system, UNCW is doing much better, but little is being done at the departmental level to evaluate good teaching. More than half the nation's universities do peer evaluations, he said, but only about 30 percent of the schools in the UNC system do them. Though the universities have done well on evaluations, according to Coble, You've got to have that, he said, before you can know whom to award.

Coble said that, compared with other schools in the UNC system, UNCW is doing much better, but

Tales from the Dumpster

BY ERIK TOTTEN
Sports Editor

Well here we are, the last Dumpster that this Semester. There are so many topics that are deserving of a place in the Dumpster this week that I'm not sure where to start.

I suppose the best starting place would be the one that is closest to us all at good ol' UNCW. I found out through a few of my numerous sources that at the exhibition men's basketball game some students were actually asked to sit down and stop cheering by other students. To top it off when they refused two of the "offending" students were escorted out by some other then our beloved campus "police".

To put it lightly this blows my mind. I don't know how many times I have heard that the students need to get involved and show more support of the University. Her we have two students sitting in the student section, who are doing nothing other than standing and cheering, being prohibited from cheering because it bothers other students who aren't cheering. I can't find the exact word for my feelings toward the students that asked them to sit down or the cops that made them leave or anybody else that endorsed this but the worst disgust does come to mind. In my opinion this university is pretty apathetic in the first place - when things like this happen it's hard to wonder why. If this university is ever going to have any tradition it has to start somewhere. I agree that sometimes cheering goes too far (throwing things on the court, vulgar language, rushing the field, etc.) and that needs to be stopped but when it only involves standing up - things could be worse. Do to Duke or UNC-CH and see how many students don't smack you when you ask them to sit down.

I could go on forever about this but I suppose I've said enough for now. I do have a message for the students of UNCW - go to the games and stand up, jump up and down and make noise. If both basketball teams are on their way up and they deserve our support. To those (hopefully) few students who don't want to stand up and cheer I say go sit upstairs with the older folks and let somebody who will support the team have your seat - you don't deserve it.

Well I have only one more thing to say before I close. Remember who picked Nebraska number one at the start of the college football season? That's right your reading him - your one and only sports editor. What can I say?

Well I hope everybody had a great break. I'll see you back here next semester - same time same place - until then keep your head out of the Dumpster - especially during exams.

This Week In Sports

SWIMMING

The men's team remained unbeaten through four meets while the women suffered their second loss of the season at UNC Wilmington split a dual meet with Duke over the weekend.

In their first road test of the season, the Seahawks provided Coach Dave Allen with a good barometer of how his team are progressing in the campaign. UNCW's men defeated Duke, 155-88, and Duke's women claimed a 161-84 verdict over the Lady Seahawks.

"I was fairly pleased with the meet," Allen said, "I was from first road trip and we needed to see how we handled ourselves."

The men received strong performances from veteran Burke Elden and Robert Danner on route to the easy victory. Elden won the 200 IM (1:57.06), 200 Butterfly (1:56.22) and 200 Backstroke (1:57.20). Danner captured the 50 Freestyle (21.69) and 100 Freestyle (48.01).

"We had a lot of improved performances throughout the men's meet," said Allen. "Many of our second, third and fourth place finishers bettered their times. The men did a very respectable job. Winning at Duke was big victory for us going into the Thanksgiving break."

ON the women's side, senior Cameron King and junior Karla Zick were the top swimmers. King won the 1,000 Freestyle (10:35.22) and 500 Freestyle (5:14.70) and Zick broke the 2:30.00 mark for the first time this season in the 200 Breast.

"Our women did not perform that well," said Allen. It was not a real good meet for us. We did not swim as well as the road as I would have liked. Our women are younger and need a little more maturity."

Overall, though, Allen is pleased with the start of the Seahawks, who take a week off between swimming at the College of Charleston on Dec. 3. "We're slightly ahead of last year for the men. We are swimming a bit stronger and that is very encouraging. For the women, the loss to Richmond put us behind schedule somewhat."

BASKETBALL

Auburn placed four players in double figures en route to a 94-75 season-opening win against UNCW before 2,072 fans at Beard-Edwards Memorial Coliseum Sunday afternoon.

Aaron Swinson led all scorers with 21 points. Wesley Person scored 19, Aubrey Wiley added 17 and Lance Worms chipped in with 10 to lead the Tigers. Point guard Wesley Flanigan dished out nine assists.

We got quality play from the players we expected to play well," Auburn head coach Tommy Joe Eagles said. "Person, Swinson and Wiley did a great job on both ends of the floor."

The Tigers shot an impressive 66.7 percent from the floor in the game - including 19-of-27 in the second half (for 70.4 percent). Auburn out rebounded the Seahawks 32-19.

Auburn led the entire game. The Tigers raced to an 17-4 lead on a bank layup by Saison with 13:00 remaining in the opening half and never looked back.

The Seahawks trimmed Auburn's lead to 20-17 on a Lance Franklin with a layup with 8:43 to play in the half, but the Tigers answered. UNCW would get no closer as the Tigers stretched their lead to nine, 41-32, in the half.

Auburn steadily increased its lead in the second half. Holding a 55-45 lead with 13:18 to play in the game, Auburn outscored UNCW 10-2 over the next three minutes to build its lead to 65-47 with 10:18 left. The Seahawks would get no closer than 13 points the remainder of the game as the Tigers stretched their lead to 19, 84-75.

UNCW (0-2) was paced by John Span's 15 points. Keith Meighen scored 13 and Sherif El-Saidy added 10.

Sailing Club

BY SCOTT ENSIGN
SAILING WRITER

Four years ago, Glenn Walker came to UNCW. Four years ago, UNCW's sailing club was nonexistent. Through immeasurable time and effort, Glenn Walker has built the UNCW Sailing Club from scratch. Engaging assistance from several community individuals, the club has quickly become a well organized and successfully recognized group. Virtually the founder (occasionally founder) of the Sailing Club, Glenn has laid the foundation for a competitive team on an intercollegiate level. What's more, in it's four year history the club has provided invaluable service to the sailors of UNCW.

Club sports are a significant part of the UNCW community, not only on a personal level for those involved, but for making UNCW substantially competitive and therefore intercollegiate recognized. Intercollegiate sailing is an extremely competitive sport nationwide, and the involvement of UNCW in this arena is great, both personally and for UNCW.

The Sailing Club will grow ever stronger over the years as it serves the UNCW community. It is invaluable for the friends it has brought together. So, those of us involved presently, and the future sailors of UNCW, want to give Glenn the thanks he deserves for his initiative, and his effort over the last four years to give UNCW the Sailing Club it has today.

Senior Athlete Profile

BY JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Cameron King is a senior on this year's UNCW Men's and Women's Swimming team, competing in the long distance freestyle events (500 m, 1,000 m, 1,650 m). Cameron is originally from Charlotte, North Carolina and will graduate in the Spring of 1995 with a degree in Outdoor Recreation.

Cameron started swimming at the age of five on a summer league. "The pool was down the street where I was growing up and I loved the water, so my brother's friends talked me into joining the team," commented Cameron. Cameron was swimming year round by the age of seven. At eight years old, Cameron was a point in his life when she had to choose between swimming and gymnastics, which she also began participating in at the age of five. Cameron continued swimming and qualified for the Junior National Club at thirteen years old. In junior high, Cameron discovered there was more to life than swimming and quit swimming at the age of fifteen. Then Cameron began swimming again in high school but nothing serious. During the time she had off from swimming, Cameron got really interested in triathlons and mountain biking. When Cameron came to the decision to come to college, she started to swim again to get in shape for triathlons, therefore she "walked-on" the swim team. Cameron at one UNCW basically because they had a swim team and she got accepted here.

During Cameron's first year swimming at UNCW, she improved quite a bit, capturing the award of Most Improved Swimmer. Her second year swimming she received a scholarship. Going into her final season, Cameron would like to continue to get better as the year progresses. She would like to see the Women's team place among the top three at the conference championships and the Men's team place among the top two. Cameron would also like to see the team come together more because they have trouble in the past with teammates not being committed to swimming. Cameron states, "It is time to come together and give it your all because one person can really make a difference."

Cameron feels she has benefited from being a member of the UNCW Swim team. "I have to organize my time better, because we have practice so much during the day," replies Cameron. The team practices in the morning from 6-7:15 a.m. Monday, Wednesday, and Friday and in the afternoons from 2-4 p.m. Monday through Friday. Cameron also feels she is in better shape than she was four years ago, and she likes the support system being on an athletic team give you.

After graduation from UNCW, Cameron has many goals and expectations. "The first thing I want to do when I graduate is to hike the Appalachian trail or backpack through Europe to see the world," comments Cameron. In the future Cameron hopes to move out West to work with Outward Bound - an outdoor adventure program. She will continue to compete in triathlons and keep-up with mountain biking. As far as swimming goes, Cameron will still train for it since it is part of triathlons but won't primarily focus on it. Cameron states, "It is easy to get burnt-out on swimming, so I am looking in to branching out more."

Cameron would like to see a few changes in the swimming program at UNCW after the graduates. "I would like to see the program spend more time on mental and technical training (starts and turns) through the use of video equipment - to watch ourselves is a great tool," states Cameron. Cameron would also like to see the addition of an outdoor pool or one that is opened to the outside. She believes to train outside is a "great mental boost." Especially since we have great weather for it.

Cameron has had a good support system during her swimming career at UNCW. Her friends on the team keep her going, especially Karla Zick who is another long distance swimmer on the team. "We push each other in practice and help each other outside of practice too, we keep each other motivated," stated Cameron. Her boyfriend, Blake Stevenson - a former UNCW swimmer, helps Cameron train and offers her moral support. Cameron's parents are very supportive also, who listen to her at anytime and never pushing her into this sport. "They don't know where I got athletic talent because neither of them are athletic," Cameron comments about her parents' reaction.

Cameron sums her UNCW experiences by saying: "It's helped me to grow a lot both mentally and physically and to open my eyes to other cultures since I lived in Charlotte all my life. It changed the way I look at people and now I am more tolerant of different people. It has also made me more independent not having my parents around."

US Air Tournament DEC. 17 & 18

BY JIM CLARK
Staff writer

Miss the Seahawks in their only home appearance so far this year? Don't want to wait until January 8 to check out Kevin Eastman's new "runt"?

You are in luck. The Seahawks will be home for the U. S. Air East Coast Basketball Classic on December 17 and 18. This two-day tournament will pit UNCW against Grambling State, Georgia State, and South Florida.

MVP Tim Shaw, won the inaugural event last year.

UNCW will play the late game (8 p.m.) on Friday, Dec. 17, against Grambling State. South Florida will take on Georgia State at 6 p.m.

The winners will play the following day at 8 p.m., the consolation at 6 p.m.

The Georgia State Panthers will be led by Zayvian Smith and Terrence Brindley. Smith has been rated an NBA prospect. He averaged 14.7 points, 7.8 rebounds, and 2.1 blocks per game two years ago, before sitting out last year because of academic difficulties.

Grambling State comes off its most successful campaign in 4 years and have high hopes for this year. The Tigers return last year's #10 leading scorer in the country Kenny Sykes. The 6-4 junior All-America candidate averaged 23.9 points, 5.0 rebounds, 3.4 assists, while shooting 50% from the field and 75% from the free throw line.

South Florida returns three starters from last year's 8-19 team. The Bulls will be led by Metro Conference All-Rookie team member Chuck Atkins. The 5-10 Atkins collected 10.2 points, 3.4 rebounds and 4.0 assists last year. Plenty of tickets remain for this event. Students receive a 50% discount on the two-day event. The cost for students, with a valid ID, $10. Tickets can be purchased from the ticket office in Trask 164 during normal business hours.

The Seahawks will also be home Tuesday, Dec. 21 for a game against in-state rival Campbell at 7:30 p.m.

Tickets for the Campbell game can only be picked up at the student gate the night of the game.

BRANCH DAVIDIAN TRIAL BEGINS

Eleven Branch Davidian members went on trial Monday, charged with murdering four agents of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. The charges stem from the botched raid on the Waco compound on Feb. 28, during which four ATF agents and six Branch Davidians were gunned down. A twelfth follower pleaded guilty to a lesser offense in exchange for testimony.

INVESTIGATION OF RADIOACTIVE TESTING CONTINUES

Energy Department officials said Tuesday that the previous estimate of 800 Americans involved in radioactive testing during the Cold War was much too low. From 1945 to the mid-1970s, the federal government sponsored tests exposing human subjects to highly radioactive substances. In some experiments, severely injured hospital patients were injected with plutonium and cancer patients were exposed to radiation 10 times more powerful than that used to treat leukemia. Prison inmates' testicles were immersed in irradiated water and pregnant women were served cocktails containing radioactive iron filings, according to reports. Subjects were disadvantaged, and tested independently at different times.

WHITEWATER INVESTIGATION URGED

Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole called for an investigation of President Clinton's involvement in Whitewater Development Corp. Wednesday. The White House is considering asking Attorney General Janet Reno to appoint a special prosecutor to look into a failed land deal back in Arkansas. At issue is whether the Clintons broke any laws with their investment in the development firm.

UNCW Hosts African-American Leadership Conference

Bev Smith, host of Black Entertainment Television's prime time talk show, Our Voices, will be the keynote speaker of the second N.C. African-American Student Leadership Conference, to be held Feb. 4-6 on the UNCW campus. Smith will speak at the closing banquet on Saturday, Feb. 5 at 7 p.m. at the University Center Ballroom.

The purpose of the conference is to develop and strengthen the leadership skills of African-American students and communities. It also will serve as a means of addressing problems faced by African-Americans as students, citizens, and leaders in society. About 250 students and advisers are expected from across the state, and UNCW students are encouraged to participate.

The cost to attend the conference ranges from $10 to $55. The registration fee covers the cost of four meals, workshops, a dance, conference entertainment, and keynote sessions.

Tickets may be purchased at the University Union Information Center, or by sending checks or money orders made payable to UNCW to: The Leadership Center, University Union #212, UNCW, 601 S. Thirty Years Later Tuesday marked the thirtieth anniversary of the Surgeon General's Report which concluded that smoking causes lung cancer. The report triggered the sharpest decline in smoking in history. In 1964, 42 percent of Americans smoked. Today only 26 percent smoke.

UNCW prohibits smoking at all times in classrooms, academic conference seminar rooms, building corridors, restrooms and public areas of the library. Smoking is permitted only in designated areas of buildings. This policy is similar to the current New Hanover County smoking policy.

On October 6, the New Hanover County Board of Health adopted a new regulation known as the New Hanover County Smoking Regulation (NHCSR), which takes effect January 1, 1995.

This regulation protects and promotes the public health and safety of New Hanover County citizens by limiting smoking in public places and places of employment.

According to the newly adopted regulation, smoking is prohibited in public places. Clear and readily observable signs should be posted in every building where smoking is regulated by the NHCSR. The proprietors or managers of eating establishments or places of employment must make reasonable efforts to prevent smoking in non-smoking areas. The NHCSR will be enforced by the New Hanover County Health Department.

All smoking areas in places of employment must be outside of the facility, or serviced by a separate and adequate heating, ventilation, and air conditioning (HVAC) system, in accordance to current standards established by the American Society of HVAC Engineers.

Owners of eating establishments must designate non-smoking areas consisting of at least 40% of all indoor seating by January 1, 1996; and 100% by January 1, 2000.

However, eating establishments may designate a smoking area, provided a separate and adequate HVAC system is installed to provide a smoke-free environment.

The Health Department will maintain a continuing effort to educate the public regarding health problems related to second-hand smoke.

President Clinton's Health Care Plan includes tougher laws and warnings concerning cigarette smoking. It also relies on higher taxes on tobacco.

Rev. James E. Brown Speaks at the King Commemoration

Dr. Martin L. King Jr. Remembered

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

January 12, 1994 marked the 11th Annual Program of Commemoration for Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. The program, sponsored by the Office of Minority Affairs, featured keynote speaker, Rev. James E. Brown. The commemoration opened with a rendition, by UNCW Alumni Rudy and Cynthia Tyson, of "Precious Lord", Dr. King's favorite gospel hymn. The University Center Ballroom was filled with an abundance of multi-cultural, socio-economically diverse believers and advocates of Dr. King's dream: The dream that one day, people of all races will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood.

Dr. King was born January 15, 1929 and unselfishly devoted his life to changing the hatred and prejudice of the world. He not only preached, but advocated his ideas and beliefs in a non-violent manner. He joined not only with fellow African-Americans, but persons of any race who wanted change as much as he did. "All that he did, it was his best," said Rev. Brown, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Jacksonville, N.C.

It is virtually impossible to omit a certain race from society; thus, it is preposterous to think that one race is better than any other. According to Rev. Brown, we are all African. The oldest human remains were found in Africa, and that blood flows through the veins of us all, not just African-Americans. "We are tied together in one garment of destiny," said Brown. Unfortunately, we are all going to Make a Run For The Border

Three UNCW freshmen were caught stealing a floor mat from the College Road Taco Bell on Sunday. Wanetta Campbell, Taco Bell manager, said three young women from Raleigh went into the store with a parent. While the parent got in line, the girls rolled up the mat and put it into the car. Another customer witnessed the theft and reported it. The police came, but Campbell did not press charges.

Campbell said nine floor mats costing $50 each have been stolen since August. "We want the college kids to know we're happy to have them but, they're killing me!"

Campbell said she has had other problems with people she believes to be students. Picture frames costing $15 each are stolen frequently. Several men even stole a commode from the men's restroom and then smashed it outside.

Campbell wants people to realize she will not put up with theft. Although she said she did not press charges this time, she says she will in the future. "If you want to advertise for Taco Bell, don't steal anything. I'll give you a free t-shirt or friebie."

The College Road store is the only Taco Bell in Wilmington that has these kinds of problems. Campbell says the stores like to be part of the community and help in any way they can. She wants people to realize that stealing from them hurts business. "When you're selling 69 cent tacos it's hard to replace items that are stolen each month," Campbell said.

Could The Big Turn Off Pay Off?

BY AMY BRENNAN

Last semester, three UNCW students and a professor had the opportunity to meet Dr. Jane Goodall, who is famous for her studies of primates.

They attended a four-day conference sponsored by the Schweitzer Institute in Connecticut. Representatives from all over the United States attended the conference, which offered seminars about environmental education issues and how they affect our community.

UNCW has set up a program to help reduce its impact on the environment by conserving energy. "The Big Turn Off" is a program to cut energy consumption and create awareness about why it is important to do so. The Environmental Concerns Organization and the Chancellor's Energy Conservation Committee are sponsoring the program which is a competition between dormitories and other buildings on campus. Each building's heat, water, and electricity use will be monitored each month. It will then be compared to the use by that same building during the same month for the previous year. The building whose use of electricity decreases each month for each of the three utilities wins. Beginning in February, the winning residence and non-residence buildings will be rewarded. The competition will continue through the end of April. Then the building who has cut its energy consumption the most overall will win.

The purpose of the "Big Turn Off" is to reduce UNCW's impact on the environment as well as to cut costs. It also hopes to increase environmental awareness and create a greater sense of community on campus through the promotion of environmental action.

The university hopes to establish this program on a long term basis so that energy consumption will always be monitored and conserved.

Harvard University held a similar competition which reduced their energy consumption by an enormous amount. It saved the school $500,000.

Presently, recycling will not be included in the competition because access to recycling bins varies from building to building. Recycling bins for aluminum cans are located in buildings around campus as well as in the recycling center behind the campus police station. The center has bins for aluminum cans, plastic, glass, and newspapers.

Cutting environmental waste and energy conservation helps everyone. Here are some recycling facts to think about next time you have the urge to throw your recyclables in the trash:

• The energy you save by recycling one aluminum can will operate a TV for three hours.

• Consumers and industry throw away enough aluminum to rebuild our entire commercial air fleet every three months.

• Recycling one aluminum can saves 65 percent of the energy required to make a new can from bauxite.

• We throw away enough glass bottles and jars to fill the Twin Towers of New York City every two weeks.

• The energy saved by recycling one glass bottle could light a 60 watt bulb for four hours.

• Americans go through 2.5 million plastic bottles every hour.

• Recycling one newspaper every day of the year saves four trees, 15 pounds of pollutants that are dumped into the atmosphere, 2,200 gallons of water, and enough electricity to light a 100 watt bulb for 152 days.

• Recycling one ton of office paper saves 17 trees.

At the beginning of each new year, many people make New Year's Resolutions. Of course, many of those resolutions are already broken by now. The Seahawk has made a few resolutions of its own.

We always want to put out a paper that covers all the issues, presents every angle fairly, and contains no typos or incorrect facts. That's what we want to do. Unfortunately, we are not professional journalists with years of experience. We also tend to get in a hurry when we test to study for or a paper to write for Thursday morning. As a result, we learn by our mistakes quite often. Excuses aside, we are beginning the semester with a more concerted effort to uphold journalistic standards, and to find mistakes before the paper goes to print.

We need your help to achieve our goals. If you know of an event that's happening or have a story idea, let us know. It might be something we haven't heard about or thought about.

If you have an opinion about something, let us know by writing a letter to the editor. I get phone calls about all sorts of topics from people who want my help with spreading an idea to others. In a lot of cases, the topics are not always very UNCW related. As a college paper, the Seahawk tries to stick to the issues that concern the campus. That's where I have trouble figuring out how I can help. If you have a concern or issue about something that really doesn't apply to the university, the best way to get your message across and talk to other people about it is to write a letter to the editor.

I had a call from a woman a few days ago who wants to put together a debate between evolutionists and creationists. She said she had talked to several science professors on campus and none were willing to participate. She said she found it hard to believe that the university teaches evolution but is not willing to stand up for themselves. If you are interested in this idea, write and let me know. I know there are plenty of people who strongly believe in that topic and who like to argue their point! I can put you in touch with others who will argue against you.

A final note related to the point I'm trying to make: The reason we are all here is to learn. You can learn from people who think and believe differently from you, but only if you open your mind.

Letter to the Editor...

Over this past holiday break, I returned to my old school to request a transcript from their registrar office. While at that office, I noticed an interesting sign which was hanging prominently on their wall. It presented an important message, both to the students and to those who serve the students, and acted as a reminder of why the school operates in the first place. I believe that this message is a good one, and that the entire UNCW community should work hard to adopt it here. Here is that message:

Students are...
... the most important people on this campus
... not cold enrollment statistics, but flesh and blood human beings with feelings and emotions like our own.
... not people to be tolerated so that we can do our own thing.

They are our thing.
... not dependent on us; rather, we are dependent on them
... not an interruption of our work, but the purpose of it.
Without students, there would be no need for this institution.

Now, in most cases, students are treated with the utmost of respect and courtesy at UNCW. In fact, there are many people who serve the students on campus in a manner which goes beyond what should be required. To these people, I say "thank you." But on occasion, some students are treated inappropriately, and this should not be tolerated by the university.

For instance, last week I called the registrar to inquire about courses I intended to add to my schedule. After being greeted, I was reminded that this was the registrar's first day back from vacation, and that they were quite busy. Realizing this, I described my situation and asked for brief assistance. In fact, the information I was requesting required only a minute or two of assistance. Instead, I was deemed for over five minutes in what seemed to be an obvious attempt to avoid assisting me. At that point, I uttered the magic words. They are, "May I please speak with your supervisor?" Immediately, as per my original request, the person on the phone finally provided me with satisfactory assistance. Then I thanked her, and we were both off the phone in a few brief minutes.

This encounter is rare, I'm sure, but I don't believe it should happen at all. If the people who are paid to serve the students are, in effect, not serving the students, what do we need them for?

Peace,

John Coffey

Sacrament of the Present Moment

To pass through the ending of one year, the experience of new years and the beginning of another year make us very conscious of time. The counting down of the seconds as we watch the ball fall in Times Square marks a moment when a new collection of hours and days is laid out before us.

It seems that I am always counting down to something. Most of us are. Be it a count down to when a paper is due, a program to be delivered, a grant to be submitted or just the weekly count down to Friday, our lives seem to be run by clocks, instruments that break time into pieces (time pieces!). And isn't it incredible how time gets filled up and there simply doesn't seem to be enough it. Future events, schedules and expectations bring incredible pressure upon the moments in which we are living.

At the other end of the spectrum is a different notion of time. The writer of a one volume history of mankind writes the following: "High up in the North in the land of Svithjod, there stands a rock. It is a hundred miles high and hundred miles wide. Once every thousand years a little bird comes to this rock to sharpen its beak. When the rock has thus been worn away then a single day of eternity will have gone by." Kind of opens our perspective, doesn't it? We live in a universe where the most common form of measurement is in light years and not just one light year, but millions and billions of light years.

It seems to me that we are out of balance and that our lives be enhanced if we were able to include some sense of spaciousness in our all too frenzied and clock runned lives.

One method of creating such spaciousness is to intentionally create a time in our day when we consciously free ourselves from thinking about events that have taken place in our past or, more importantly, all events and demands that lay in our future and focus on the present moment. If we can learn to let ourselves become aware of the present by finding a time of stillness and quiet, we can feel those moments expanding in our consciousness in a way that creates an openness and gentleness in the center of our souls. There is a genuine giftedness in this day, a sense of deep goodness and even joy that can be found as we develop the capacity for living in the present.

The faster we drive the more our attention has to be focused on what lies ahead. But if we learn to slow down, even briefly, our attention can expand, our awareness increase, our sense of connectedness with life in its fullness can grow.

Such living in the present does not come easy. It has to be a choice. Eternity waits for us any time we choose it, let past our future goal and become still to the richness and fullness and depth of life.

Our hope is that 1994 will bring you many occasions in which you discover the sacrament of the present moment.

Questioning the Fate of Our Future

WASHINGTON—I am, as I tell interviewers who want to know my political views, a "solutionist." I have little patience for those who simply moan about problems, or spend their efforts searching for villains to blame for problems. The people I admire are those with ideas for fixing problems.

So this confession is especially painful for me: There may be problems—serious, widespread, society-threatening problems—that can't be fixed.

I particularly have in mind the thousands (millions?) of young people, most of them young men, who may be irredeemable.

I'm not speaking here of mere street toughs, or even gang-bangers and murderers. No matter how much some of these violent ones frighten me, I believe most of them can be reclaimed. I've seen some of the reclaimed: by wise counselors, by religious conversion, by personal epiphanies that lead them to come to themselves and to go straight. We have to learn about how to increase the number of such rescues, but at least we know rescue is a possibility.

But there are youngsters out there who, I deeply fear, have no inner self to come to, who maim, kill and even die without remorse. These are children (and not always children) who are missing something at the very core of their being, who have no feeling for others—who seem to have no feelings at all except rage.

It is pointless to speak of rehabilitating them, since they were never habituated in the first place. They are, or so it seems to me, without a conscience.

We know them from the news stories of what we call "senseless" killing: accounts of robbers who kill their unresisting victims; accounts of killings for such trivial affronts as an odd look or being cut off in traffic; accounts of wild-firing killers who pursue their targets through streets, playgrounds and schools, with utter disregard for innocent bystanders.

Probably some among us—teachers, recreation aides and police, for instance—know these conscienceless ones even before they turn murderous. Surely the inability to care about the feelings of others must manifest itself early on.

We may even have a pretty good idea of where it comes from. The social and mental health authorities tell us that youngsters who are not loved and cuddled and taught to trust as infants never learn to love and trust and empathize. Maybe they can't.

Maybe they're like abused and abandoned puppies who, if they survive, become cunning, untamable and sometimes vicious dogs.

If so, what's the solution? The dog pound of more or less permanent incarceration?

But to give up on our children is, quite literally, to give up on our future. I won't do it. I will still look for ways—as a social commentator and as an individual—to make a difference in the lives of as many youngsters as I can. I will continue to support those who are committed to rescuing our children, whether as an aspect of their work or as an element of their character. I will go on advocating the empowerment of the natural leaders every community still possesses—the social antibodies who quietly do their healing work. I still think it's a good idea—perhaps a necessary idea—to teach parents of young children how to socialize those children, how to build their self-confidence, how to instill in them the basic values, how to get them ready for love and learning and life. It's no indictment to say too many parents don't know how to do these things. Who can blame people for not learning what they haven't been taught?

But it does seem to me that the conscienceless I find so frightening has its roots in poor parenting, and that at least some that poor parenting can be overcome by teaching parents what they ought to know. As for those who have no interest in learning—whether because they themselves are products of ruined childhood's or because they have surrendered their parental instincts to crack cocaine—would their children be worse off in foster care or even in well-run orphanages?

There are, I'm saying, ways to turn off the supply of consciencelessness at the source. Expensive ways, no doubt, and maybe more intrusive than some of us would like. But it can be done if we decide as a society to do it.

But what of the coreless, not fully human ones already plaguing us? What do we do with them as they progress from adolescence to adulthood to middle age? Is there any reason to suppose they can ever become decent, nondangerous citizens? Are they to be punished endlessly for something that truly isn't their fault?

It pains this "solutionist" to say so, but I don't know. I just don't know.

George Will

Just What Does the Public Really Know??

WASHINGTON—His enthusiasm having dethroned his judgment, Newt Gingrich, that highly carbonated congressman, has joined the Republican clamor for an independent counsel to investigate whether the Clintons did serious wrongs regarding the Whitewater land development in Arkansas.

Gingrich adopts the egalitarian cant normal when politicians express synthetic altruism: He says an independent counsel is needed lest adolescent miscreants in East L.A. think presidents are above the law. But in addition to being concerned about the civic sensibilities of wayward youths, Republicans are seeking vengeance, albeit tarred up with pieties about "the public's right to know."

Republicans think it is the Democrats' turn to experience the fangs of independent counsels. And, in fact, when President Clinton's man George Stephanopoulos says no independent counsel is needed because Whitewater "has been looked at by newspapers" and is being looked at by Justice Department," he speaks words that would be roundly ridiculed by Democrats in Congress, and by journalists, were he a Republican.

Congress created the independent counsel apparatus as a "Watergate reform" in 1978. It was accepted by President Carter against the advice of his attorney general, Griffin Bell, who rightly considered it unconstitutional.

It unleashed against the executive branch people performing the purely executive function of prosecution yet uncontrolled by the chief executive. This conflicts with the Constitution's creation of three and only three separate branches. Unaccountability has frequently bred irresponsibility, and when the independent counsel law expired last December sensible Republicans and others said good riddance.

Republicans now calling for revival of the law are ignoring its constitutional dubiousity and the damage it does the civic culture. But today the word "Watergate" still serves as an argument for the law. That is absurd.

In the summer of 1973 Republican prosecutors mounted devastating cases against the Republican president and his vice president. When the U.S. attorney for Maryland found that Spiro Agnew had taken bribes as governor, and that payments continued to him as vice president, a grand jury indicted him. He plea bargained and resigned.

He was allowed to bargain because Attorney General Elliot Richardson knew that Nixon was trapped by an investigation already far advanced before Archibald Cox became special prosecutor. The U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, a Republican, already had most of the information that filled the 90 pages he soon gave to Cox, sketching the conspiracy.

Today some Republicans, making use of their time out of power to prove that they deserve to be there, try to put a patina of seriousness on their intellectual somersaults regarding an independent counsel law. They say such a law announces the premise that the highest levels of government are usually staffed by people without integrity. Another premise is that other relevant institutions, including Congress and the media, are impotent or corrupt.

Regarding Whitewater, yes, the Clintons have proven themselves to be less than forthcoming and even misleading. But this is not a news bulletin about the pair who promised a middle-class tax cut and authored the proposed health care reform which does not read as it is advertised. Besides, what conceivable misdeeds by the Clintons in Arkansas are important enough to justify reviving an independent counsel that violates the Constitution and short circuits the political process.

Yes, Attorney General Janet Reno inspires no confidence: Her demand for the prompt resignation of all U.S. attorneys looked like an attempt to abort the investigation of Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, and her department reeks of Arkansas-style cronyism. Yes, she and the Arkansas in the department should publicly excuse themselves from participation in any Whitewater investigation.

Yes, if Clinton were a Republican, Congress and the media would have caused the independent counsel law to be revived for an investigation of White House abuses regarding the travel office. And, yes, if Clinton were a Republican, Congress would be investigating Whitewater. Congress' investigative powers, which produced the crucial Watergate breakthrough—the discovery of Nixon's taping system—are one reason an independent counsel apparatus is unnecessary.

If the Justice Department and Congress fail to function well regarding Whitewater, that will not be a constitutional crisis. On the contrary, for such political failures the Constitution provides regular occasions for coddling punishments. They are called elections.

Phil Smith Prune Cake, Wal-Mart, And Intelligent Thievery...

HAPPY NEW YEAR! I'd like to welcome all those who have returned back to another exciting semester here at Seahawk High. I pause in a moment of silence to remember those who did not achieve the 0.75 grade point average required to get a return invitation. The month of January is upon us and I'm sure everyone realizes what that means: National Prune Breakfast Month. Although this sounds like some gimmick a mother would use to try and keep everyone in the family "regular," I must admit that it is for real.

In honor of this special month, my mom made a six layer prune cake just before I returned to Wilmington. I now have a greater appreciation for all of those small towns scattered along interstate forty. This year's prune cake did not however, replace the now world famous Ho-Cake from last Christmas. My father, in a feeble but none the less successful attempt to make it into my column, demonstrated the proper technique for flipping Ho-Cake in the pan. This proved to be quite a costly measure however, because we later had to get the kitchen ceiling repainted.

In other family matters, I was pleased to hold my six month old baby niece for the very first time. Word of warning: never hold your six month old niece (or any child under the age of twelve) soon after a hearty milking and especially when you have your favorite Carolina sweatshirt on. Furthermore, I strongly advise anyone attempting to ascertain if an infant has "made water or doo" by inserting a finger into the edge of the diaper, not to do so. Lessons in life!

Another highlight of the holiday was returning to my old high school, South Daburn, to watch a basketball game. I never really knew that there were so many varieties of flannel available. Plaid was of course our school color, and flannel the school fabric. I was also persuaded to visit a local country music dance club (similar to the Palomino, but about twenty times the size) where I listened to forty or so rounds of "Way down yonder on the Chatahoocli." I became quite the two-stepper.

Turning to national news, the Bobbitts in Virginia celebrated a somewhat quiet Christmas in preparation for the upcoming trial of Lorena

"We hope to cut this thing short."

-John Bobbitt

Bobbitt. If you don't know what I'm talking about here, you need to a) pull your head up out of the ground and b) ask someone about it. It's far to disgusting for me to explore in this forum of NoBull Prize winning journalism. I do understand that when asked about the trial, the recovering John Bobbitt was heard to say, "we hope to cut this thing short."

In a still unfolding turn of world events, President Clinton is visiting several independent republics of the former Soviet Union, in an attempt to determine if it would be in the best interest of the U.S. and the western world as a whole to allow Wal-Marts to be built there. It has been supposed by prominent Republicans, still disgruntled at losing the White House, that the further spread of such department stores in the region may incite uncontrollable nationalism and help to bolster support for radical right wing Nazi and former UNCW Police officer Vladimir Zhirinovskiy, in his attempt to take over the Russian government.

In the "let's see which medical school rejected Phil this week" section, the Bowman Gray School of Medicine at Wake Forest University tops the list. I did have an interview at the UNC School of Medicine during the holiday break, and it went very well. I have one coming up soon at East Carolina and so I need all of you faithful, semi-coherent readers to keep your collective fingers crossed.

And finally, a story about criminal intelligence out of the city of Durham, NC. It seems that a Durham police officer spotted and stopped a man pushing a City of Durham official-issue refuse container along the sidewalk. Upon investigation, the officer found several pieces of electronic equipment as well as a set of forcible entry tools in the container. The man claimed to be helping his sister move into her new house but the officer, in an act of utter crime solving genius, arrested the man on suspicion of burglary. After all, the house that the alleged thief pointed out and claimed to be taking the stereo, VCR, and television to was in fact the police officer's home.

The HAT'S OFF award this week goes to the UNCW Basketball team and Head Coach, Kevin Eastman. They are off to a great start overall and the best conference start since Alexander the Great conched at the University of Macedonia. I say "Hat's Off" to the team and good luck on the road trip. The SHOE'S OFF award this time goes to that parachute guy who keeps trying to land at athletic events. Perhaps his next (and final) appearance will be at the annual Nassau County World Cup skeet shooting tournament this weekend.

That about wraps things up for me this week. Be sure to tune in next time for my special "Phil Goes To The Chancellor's House" issue. As always your comments, criticisms, and left-over Christmas goodies can be addressed to me here at The Fishwrap. Until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is a NoBull Prize winning columnist with The Seahawk and he would like to thank whoever sent the lovely Christmas card "signed" by the UNCW Police Chief.

June Oravits Typing My Way Into A Job As A Clown

The end is near. Not only have we rung in a new year, I have the added pleasure of beginning my last semester here at UNCW. Unbelievable! I'm actually going to graduate at the ripe old age of 41 and not a moment too soon because my 42nd birthday is a week after graduation.

Unfortunately, I'm starting to get a short-timer's attitude. I want everything to go into hyper-speed so I can get that diploma in my greedy hands. I've just decided I'll send a copy of that magic piece of paper to my ex-love-husband with a little Kilroy drawn in the corner and a "J" was here and you weren't" note. Maybe I'll even loose a billion pounds and have my picture taken on the beach just wearing my cap. I'd be just to cute for words. Hey, maybe I could even get some pictures of me surfing in my cap and gown. I could include these frolicking photos in my little postal offering (making it a sort of Hallmark Kodak type of moment). Better yet, maybe I just won't waste my time sending anything to my ex. But I will go surfing!!

Because 1994 has become a banner year for me, I decided to make some New Year resolutions. Generally, I don't bother with resolutions. I never keep them, so I gave up making myself feel guilty for breaking every resolution I ever make every year. This year is different; however, bearing in mind my astrological influences, I have tempered my list somewhat.

My first resolution is to forgive all the people who aggravated the hell out of me last semester playing the parking lot game at UNCW. In order to meet this resolution, I hereby give up looking for the girl in the grey car with the surf racks on top upon whom I had so desperately wanted to wreak my revenge. Of course, we're only into the first week of classes. But I will try to be more tolerant as I cruise for parking spaces.

My second resolution is to have more patience. This one actually goes hand-in-hand with the first resolution. So, I guess I'll have to try to be more patient playing the UNCW parking game as well as tolerant of the other ideas (excuse me, players) in the game. Patience is definitely what I need to make it until May 14.

Because of my limited tolerance for resolutions, I've only made one other New Year's resolution—get a job. Granted, I have one valuable asset a lot of regular tradition students don't have, a solid work history behind me. But, that's not the problem with my getting a job upon graduation. The problem, as anyone who has known me for even a modicum of time is aware, I can do some major bone-headed stuff that may not necessarily show up as a glint in a potential employer's eye.

For example, some years back (never mind how many), my husband-at-the-time and I moved to Virginia when he was hired as an air traffic controller at Washington National Airport. Two days after we arrived, I managed to get an interview for a job as an administrative assistant. No problem, I figure, with my good work history and supervisory experience, this interview should be a breeze. But, I forgot to figure in the June factor, if something can get screwed up, I'll be sure to do it.

There I am, I've gone through a panel of people who have grizzled me on everything from Lave magazine to I read, Time or Newsweek (shows whether you're a people person or an analytical number-cruncher kind of person) to the standard "Where do you want to be in five years?" question. Now they throw in the hard stuff; they actually want me, June Oravits, to take a typing test. Well, okay, I can do that.

I'm precessed with this goofy-looking typewriter featuring an extra long carriage gizmo. I figure this machine is for some kind of legal defense briefs or something. Anyway, I'm given a pre-typed page and told to re-type it in x-amount of time. The timer is set, the personnel director sits back in a chair, and off I go typing like there's no tomorrow.

After what feels like forever, the timer goes off and the director scrutinizes my finished work of art. Her eyebrows begin to fold up like spastic caterpillars, they actually appear to wiggle. Pretty soon those caterpillars seem to meet in some mating ritual I can't figure out. The owner of these eyebrow oddities looks at me and asks why I only typed one line?

One line! What does she mean, one line?! I ungraciously snatch the paper out of her hand and look at it, eager to point out I'd typed everything on her pre-typed document. But no, she's right, c-j-y one line is neatly typed across the top of the page. Simultaneously, we both turn and look at the typewriter (as though it's the miscreant responsible for this conundrum). Yes, indeed, therein lay the root of my problem. I, June the Great, had forgotten to set the margins.

Oh, mortification! So much for this job. Then, to top off my already upset interview skills, I got an awful case of the giggles. After all, when all else fails you may as well laugh. For some reason, the personnel director liked my response and gave me the job. Two years later I was promoted to manager of the executive offices with a secretary of my own. Not bad for an insane woman!

So, in my determination to get a job, I've established the criteria for achieving my goal—avoiding any semblance of a typing test. But, I think I'll keep my good humor; if nothing else works, I can always get a job as a clown.

Know Your Rights!

BY AMY BRENNAN
Editor In Chief

Only 24 percent of UNCW's students live on campus. This means that 76 percent of students find some other source of shelter. Many students are on a tight budget so they rent older or run-down dwellings that cost less but are in need of repair. Problems between landlords and tenants occur on a regular basis. Legal problems associated with rental properties can be avoided if you know your rights.

It is the landlord's responsibility to provide a safe and healthy place to live. Habitability requires the landlord to comply with building and housing codes, and to make repairs to keep property safe and livable. He or she is required to repair electrical, plumbing, sanitary, heating, and other major utility systems and appliances.

In return, the tenant is required by law to keep the property clean by getting rid of garbage properly and taking care of plumbing fixtures. They should also avoid deliberately defacing, damaging, or removing any part of the property. Tenants are responsible for any damages other than those considered normal wear and tear. They must also comply with building housing codes.

In most cases, the landlord and tenant will sign a lease which states the terms and conditions under which a piece of property is to be rented. A lease cannot impose terms that are contradictory to laws or public policy.

A lease states specifically the time period in which a renter will occupy a property. Under the contract, the renter is liable for the rent for the entire time period. Most written leases are based on 12 month periods. Many of the apartments around campus offer nine month leases for college students. Some students choose to rent year round but sublet to someone else during the summer. Most leases allow subletting without written agreement from the landlord. However, the primary tenant is still liable to the landlord for any rent or damages done by the sub-tenant. In cases where a sub-tenant or roommate does not pay his share of the rent,

New Album:

Kristin Hersh will release her solo debut album HIPS AND MAKERS on SIRE at the end of January '94. Recorded in just two weeks with producer Lewny Kaye, Hips and Makers is one of the most organic and improvisational records you're likely to hear in '94. Kristin's intricate guitar textures and beautiful voice are augmented by little more than sparse percussion and the occasional emergence of a mute cello. Kristin is the catalyst behind critically acclaimed Throwing Muses - one of America's most consistently innovative rock bands. Kristin's music on Hips and Makers however, has little in common with the Muses sound and should stand alone - perhaps more so than any other solo effort of the last few years.

Her rare song writing talent and emotionally-wrenching delivery combine to make for a powerfully creative debut. The first video from the album

"YOUR GHOST" was just filmed in Athens, Georgia. The track features a duet with REM lead vocalist Michael Stipe in a beautiful blend of both singers' voices.

This is an artist and album you won't forget.

Wally World 90210

By D. Neal Leeper
Entertainment Editor

For many weeks now, people have requested that I do a column relating to the fine television show Beverly Hills 90210. (Well, actually, no one has really expressed any interest in it, but I think there is an underground following somewhere!)

If you haven't been watching the show lately, you have missed quite a lot. First off, Donna and David have called it splitville. Several weeks ago, Donna gave in to David's romantic escapades and decided to "put out" on their one-year anniversary. After the candles were set, music activated, and partial clothes removed, the doorbell rang and Donna's parents interrupted. Donna was rushed out to church the next day and reverted back to the "anti-sex" mode. David decided that he could put a Coke bottle in his pants and get more out of the relationship so he ended it there. But, we're still going to wonder how Donna will relate to real life now.

With the stress building in David's life, my rappin' man switched to the mysterious "happy" powder acquired from his mentor at the radio station. The white substance that resembles cocaine is much better when served with orange juice. Why did David need to take drugs? The main reason was that he needed something to keep him up for his two a.m. radio show. After taking the uppers to keep him awake, his personality shifted to one of happiness and excitement. Actually, the more I think about it, maybe he's happy because he dumped Donna. I know I would be ecstatic.

Switching our focus to the convenient and generic KEG house, the brothers of this fine Fraternity decided to boot John Sears from the Brotherhood via the infamous "blackball" vote. It came to light that Brother Sears made the mysterious phone call to the security office to report Saunders breaking in to a faculty members office. So, Brother Saunders is a hero and the stud-muffin in Sears in the doghouse.

Moving on to the hottest subject of the new year: Brenda Walsh. Yes folks, the bitch is gone. Well, almost. According to Entertainment Weekly's January 14, 1994 edition, Shannen Doherty's tardiness, bad attitude, uncooperative attitude, and continuous bad press has caused producer Aaron Spelling to delay renewing the contract of the lamo-star. Doherty has not been "officially" notified of her termination but, come on, folks, if her contract hasn't been renewed and everyone else's has, is there any doubt? Well, c'est la vie, el bicho.

Dylan, Dylan, Dylan, Dylan.... is there anyone out there who doesn't want a piece of that trust fund? And now for the scoop on Dylan. Well, some mysterious lady appeared a couple weeks ago claiming to be one of Jack McKay's lovers (i.e.: professional ho). And guess what? This professional prostitute has a cute and adorable daughter. So, of course, Dylan, being the fine person that he is, bonds with the little girl and feels sorry for the mother. He gives her a substantial amount of money and the mom heads home to take care of a few things. The little girl steals the social security card out of her mother's purse so Jim Walsh can now run a background check and verify the woman's history. Gee, I wonder if the woman will turn out to be a crook and if Dylan will get stuck with the kid?

This week, we get to find out some incredible news. Oh, big surprise! Somebody is pregnant. Well, let's examine the woman that are on the show. First off, Donna is a virgin and probably too stupid to get pregnant anyway. Besides, Donna could never get pregnant. After all, her Dad is the producer of the show and would never allow anything of that nature to happen. Second, Kelley has been "ho'ing" around for years; so, it would only make sense that she was put on the pill back in third grade. The only chickie-poo to remain is our good friend Andrea Zuckerman (the chick that rode the bus to all high school events). You have to keep in mind that Andrea lost her virginity in college to the brilliant R.A. down the hall. So, with that in mind, Erik Totten (Seahawk Sports Editor) and I firmly believe that Andrea has been knocked up. Unfortunately, by the time this article comes out, the world will know the answer.

Let us not forget about Brandon. Brandon has been keeping up with the trials and battles of fairness and injustice in the college system. And, to the dismay of others, he still calls Fraternities "Frats." Oh, well. Nobody is perfect.

Well, that sums up the happenings in the wonderful "Wally World" of Beverly Hills 90210. Keep your eyes open for my next update of those crazy kids in never-never land.

Prong and Bad Brains

By Sam Cuthrell
Entertainment Writer

For all you scholarly fanatics who got caught up in frenzied efforts to cram for that big exam and missed the Dec. 4th appearance of Dig, Prong, and Bad Brains at the Mad Monk, I've only got three words: You missed out!

After arriving halfway through Dig's set, I was immediately impressed by their live show, featuring lots of my favorite thing - loud, obnoxious music. Their set ran the gamut from alternative to a few pop-ish Top 40-style tunes. Their new video for "Believe" can be seen on MTV at the top of every hour, at the half hour, the quarter-hour and twice during Alternative Nation.

Prong came on strong with "Prove You Wrong" and "Hell If I Could" along with other cuts from their latest album. (At this point, the pit got slightly nasty, and, in my state of extreme inebriation, I managed to obtain various bumps and bruises, along with a pair of wonderful black eyes. Try explaining that to the guys at work.)

Bad Brains were much better than expected, playing mostly older hardcore material, with only one reggae song thrown in (thank goodness). Several fights broke out, prompting the Brains front man to blurt "Hey, stop the violence, mon!" I've always wanted to hear a Jamaican say that.

Overall, the show was an absolute must-see, and having the bouncers frisk everybody at the door was a definite plus, also. (I went through three times, just for the thrill.) Too bad, they found the assault rifle I had stashed in my sock.

If you missed the show, too bad. It was definitely worth the ticket price, and being called "Hamburger Kid" at work the next day.

Thought Of The Week:

A Letter to the Entertainment Editor?

Now, I know I ain't no worldly man, but I do know what I think is stupid. I went to the basketball game ya'll had on Saturday and, I just don't understand what ya'll call entertaining.

First off, what in the hell was that Elvis wanna be doing on the court? I don't know which member of your athletic department thought it would be funny to bring out a half-ass impressionist but, let me tell you what. It weren't funny.

Instead of not giving money to a student to shoot them shots, they had "Elvis". Now, I ain't no social commentator but, with all the talk about athletes being role models, the last person I suspect to see being glorified is Elvis.

This is a boy who married a 12 year old, died from an overdose, had pastry filling in his veins, and shot television and cars when he felt like it.

Now, that's stupid. Almost as dumb as some of them cheerleaders do. Now, I understand they are ranked in the top ten in the country for their routines but, why can't they spend some time on coming up with a new cheer? "Everybody yell 'Let's...Let's...Everybody yell 'Go'....Go. Please. What is wrong with them? Don't they think most people can read?

I went to that game Monday as well and was sad to see not one student make fun of that fellow named Fudd. What's the matter, ain't none of the rednecks have a hunting outfit to wear? No one thought to make a sign with Bugs Bunny on it.

Speaking of signs, why in the hell did Channel 3 think people would actually return the signs after the game? I've heard of cheap but, good God.

Now, I have heard that the Bud Light Daredevils are coming soon but, I don't know how they can top that half-time show put on by the Little Seahawks. Why, except to make parents pay some money to see their little crumb grubber bounce a basketball off his knee, would anyone want to see that?

I know that it is probably difficult to come up with entertaining half-time events, but Elvis and the Little Seahawks are hopefully the bottom rung of half-time entertainment.

Heck, I'd rather watch the dance team have sexual epileptic seizures to the beat of somebody's car stereo. Now, I'd probably come out for another game but, hopefully, the only entertainment won't be while the play is in motion.

Make your problem your solution. No people are freed by another group of people. We are freed by our own activity," said Brown.

Dr. King not only got on the field, he led his followers to numerous victorious battles in the war of prejudice and hate. He not only changed the views and traditions of his own generation, but influenced all generations that preceded.

"It is a note worthy occasion for bringing the university together to commemorate Dr. King," said Chancellor Leutze, who marched with Dr. King in Washington.

I wish I could do more to instill the goodness of his life especially to our youth. We appear to be showing a lot of hatred toward one another. I wish we all could model ourselves based on Dr. King's philosophy. One of the most important aspects is that Dr. King lived the life he preached," said Ralph Parker, Dean of Minority Affairs.

Numerous students, faculty, administrators, and members of the Wilmington and Jacksonville area joined hands and remembered the dream of a great leader in commemoration of a King. "The program is inspirational for everybody. It is a nice remembrance of Dr. King; a remembrance to keep his dream alive," said Deborah Gay.

The Omicron Theta Chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Incorporated will sponsor a Martin Luther King, Jr. program this evening in the University Union Room 103 at 6:00 p.m.

"It is not only an obligation, but a duty to pay respect to the great Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.; not only as a fellow brother of Alpha Phi Alpha, but as a great man that we all should look up to," said Ralph Brown.

Lemuel Abdullah, master of ceremonies at tonight's program claimed, "Dr. King's generation had more unity than our generation has. We believe in his dream, but the entire African-American community does not abide by it simply because of laziness and apathy about today's society and its future."

"Steps toward better campus unity include self-awareness and positively influencing one another to achieve our common goal," said the president of Omicron Theta Chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha.

you have the right to seek money owed by filing a claim in Small Claims Court. The landlord can still hold each roommate individually responsible for the full amount owed.

Always uphold your end of the lease. You should not withhold rent in retaliation because the landlord fails to keep his end of the contract. You will be much safer legally if you follow the lease and seek help from the proper outside authorities.

In situations where the landlord does not make necessary repairs, which may violate building codes, you can call a code enforcement officer, file a complaint in Small Claims Court, or file a rental abatement. An abatement is a refund of a portion of rent already paid which is equal to the difference between the rental value of the property under the lease and the fair market rental value in the deteriorated condition.

As soon as a repair becomes necessary, send a written notice to your landlord describing the problem. The landlord is required to respond within a reasonable time limit. Wilmington and New Hanover County have building code enforcement officers who will inspect your property to be sure it is safe and up to standards. They can require landlords to make the necessary repairs or condemn the property. The landlord cannot evict you for filing a complaint. It is against the law for him to lock you out without court process.

Almost every rental property requires a security deposit. This deposit cannot be more than one and a half months rent for a month to month rental, nor more than two months rent for yearly rental. The landlord must put your deposit into a bank account and return it to you when you move out according to the terms of your lease. The landlord must return the deposit within thirty days or give you a written explanation of how the money was used to cover your damages to the property.

It is a good idea to inspect the property when you move in and make a list of problems for the landlord as well as a copy for yourself. It also helps to take pictures of problems when you move in. This can prevent disputes when it comes time to vacate and get your deposit back. If you have problems getting your deposit back, you may take the landlord to Small Claims Court.

Tenants have responsibilities in addition to those stated in the lease. In January 1989, New Hanover County adopted a noise ordinance. It is illegal to produce any noise which exceeds 65 decibels in the daytime and 50 decibels between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. You can be charged with violating the noise ordinance even if the level is not measured with a sound meter. Violation of the ordinance can result in a $50 fine, misdemeanor conviction, or court order.

In June 1989, New Hanover County adopted an ordinance which says that no more than three unrelated people may share one household without a special use permit. Five or more unrelated students living together may be accused of running a "de facto fraternity / sorority house." Fraternity and sorority houses require a special use permit. Fines for this offense are $50 each day that the violation contin-

A Social Fraternity Organizes Delta Mathematics League

The UNC Wilmington chapter of Delta Tau Delta Fraternity, a national social fraternity, has organized the Delta Mathematics League for high schools across North Carolina. Currently participating are teams from New Hanover and Lenoir high schools in Wilmington, Southwest Guilford in Greensboro, and West Mecklenburg in Charlotte.

"Our fraternity was founded on the principles of academic achievement, and we are dedicated to education of youth," explained Jonathan Rowell, UNCW senior who is director of academic affairs of the Zeta Tau Chapter of Delta Tau Delta.

"We decided to start the Delta Mathematics League to help foster similar ideals among today's high school students. This league provides an opportunity to elevate high school academic stars to the place generally reserved for athletes. We think that recognition may inspire other students to work harder at their studies," said Rowell.

The league is designed for students with a strong grasp of mathematical applications, but does not require advanced course study for students to be competitive. High school league participants take five tests from October to February. Test questions were developed by a senior math major who was also a former NC Math League state champion and on the Academic All-USA Team.

Participating high schools may sponsor up to three teams of five members each. Similar to athletic conferences, the teams will be organized into academic conferences. Each test will be considered a conference "meet." Each team's score will be the sum of its four highest individual scores. At the end of the fifth test, final conference standings will be determined and awards presented to the top two teams and top three individuals in the league.

Winning the first contest was South West Guilford I, and Micol Christopher of Lenoir High School had a perfect score.

Jeff Gurkin narrowly defeated Tonya Whitehead for Vice President last semester in SGA's November 16-17 elections.

Will Stanley and Malissa Elkins were also elected spring Representatives-at-Large. Gurkin beat Whitehead by two votes, with 134. Stanley received 168 votes. Elkins won with 152.

Gurkin, a senior, said he mainly plans to work with the budget process in SGA. He said he wants to help clubs, organizations and care for the student body as a whole. "I want to help the student Senate run effectively and make sure they're doing what's best for students and not themselves," he said.

The budget process needs to be reexamined, since funding needs for clubs have grown, Gurkin said. He attributed greater needs for funding to the recent recession. He said that clubs were previously funded either by members or fundraisers, but that when the recession hit, the money just wasn't there. As a result, organizations turned to SGA for additional money. Gurkin said he plans to work with the budget process to see how it can be improved to benefit clubs and organizations.

Stanley, a freshman, said he got involved in SGA because he is interested in government. However, he said he does not have any goals for what he wants to accomplish. "I'm just learning a lot about the Senate," he said.

Elkins, a freshman who wants to be a politician, said she thought working with SGA would be good experience. She is interested in working on the Judiciary and Budget Committees. "I'm still learning a lot about what the Senate does, but I want to represent the students," Elkins said. "If they have a problem and want someone they can turn to."

Tales from the Dumpster

BY ERIK TOTTEN
Sports Editor

Well—we're back for another fun-filled semester at UNC Wilmington. I don't know about you but, I would rather be elsewhere since I have to be at school—I guess it might as well be here.

Before I continue any further with the Dumpster I want EVERYBODY to know that I was one kick away from picking one of the biggest upsets ever in college football. All of you who follow the Dumpster will remember that before the College season started I picked Nebraska #1. I guess all of you can see my wonderful insight into the Sporting world. I will be available for prophecies and predictions, just call 1-900-ASK-ERIK—$75.00 for the first minute, 25 cents each additional minute.

My main topic for the Dumpster this week are those "Users" in the little yellow coats at our basketball games. What do these guys actually do? All I ever see them do is ask me for my press pass. Little kids run around constantly and bother the radio announcers and practically tackle the players during warm-ups and they stand there with their hands in their pockets. If a student ran out and did anything like that they'd get gang tackled and beat with clubs. I've got nothing against little kids but, get them out of the way. If students aren't allowed to run around and ask players for autographs then neither should anybody else.

Here's a hint for those "users"—just a little advice from me to them—do your job—it's what you're there for. Anyway that's all for now—tune in next week. Until then or until figure skaters get attacked—keep your head out of the Dumpster.

Charlotte's Right To Play?

This article was received from the University of North Carolina at Charlotte and it was requested that it be run in The Seahawk.

Two years ago, UNC Charlotte got a tremendous boost when the men's basketball team was invited to play in the Diet Pepsi Tournament of Champions here in Charlotte. According to UNC Sports Information, it had been recommended by the late Jim Valvano and the North Carolina State Wolfpack that letting the 49ers participate in the tournament wouldn't be a bad idea. Charlotte Pepsi President and avid UNC supporter Dale Hinton agreed.

The 49ers joined a competitive field including N.C. State, and well as top 20 teams DePaul and Alabama. UNC beat DePaul and Alabama to win the Diet Pepsi Tournament of Champions in their first appearance; as a result, they were ranked in the top 25.

Not only was this tournament advantageous to the basketball team, it was also a valuable financial endeavor—just by advancing to the championship, a school is guaranteed $75,000, approximately one-fifth of the UNC basketball budget.

N.C. State and UNC Chapel Hill alternate as host of the tournament, and the following season was to be the Tarheel's year to host. But UNC Chapel Hill's athletic committee established a policy in 1977 against scheduling interstate, non-ACC schools. Smith said he would not play if UNC Charlotte was in the field.

Thus, UNC's invitation to defend their title was abruptly revoked.

"You'd have to let everybody else in (if you let UNC in)," Smith was quoted as saying in the September 10, 1992 edition of The Charlotte Observer. "That's my whole thing. I've said it over and over. Why would we let Davidson, or NC State or East Carolina or Campbell in?"

The issue at hand is not UNC's underlying desire to grace the very same court as Smith and his team; it isn't anyone's lifelong dream in the green and gold to play the Tarheels. Here in Charlotte, we have more important opponents to worry about—namely, Louisville, Tulane, and Virginia Commonwealth.

"The reason the tournament has always been of interest to us is because it is in our community and supported by our community." 49er Head Coach Jeff Mullins was quoted as saying in The Charlotte Observer on September 10, 1992. "We are this community's university. For that reason, we have a great deal of interest in the tournament, not because of who it is, but because it's here in Charlotte."

The real issue is the Tarheel's oppression of our entire campus. All we want is to be able to play in a tournament that could mean so much to UNC, both image-wise and financially.

Until now, this story has been covered up and forgotten, dismissed by those concerned by simply saying, "You can't go against Duke Smith." The men and women who fought to keep this institution open 44 years ago would be appalled to see our "lay down and die" approach to such a dilemma.

It was the pioneer spirit of the 49ers that kept us alive then, and now is the time for this spirit to be rekindled. We cannot stand idly by and allow such oppression. The fact that Chapel Hill is denying an admittance into a tournament in our own town is a travesty.

This season, the tournament is up for review. If Pepsi decides it doesn't like what is going on, they can choose to remove their name from the tournament. If Chapel Hill's tyranny and egotistic abuse of power continues, Pepsi could find itself in a conflict of interest—Pepsi is contributing $1.25 million to the Student Activity Center on the UNC campus.

The bottom line is this: UNC Charlotte is a growing institution that has earned the right to be represented in the nation's college basketball spotlight. No one, not even the Tarheels, should be allowed to harness and stunt the growth of a university such as our own.

Track Preview

1993-94 TRACK & FIELD OUTLOOK

After losing key veterans from last year's record-setting team, youth is the catchword for the 1993-94 Seahawk track and field team as second-year coach Jim Sprecher welcomes 51 freshmen to the roster.

"Athletically, we're a lot more talented on both sides from a year ago," says Sprecher. "However, we're a young team that will need time to develop and adjust to collegiate track. We've added some excellent athletes and feel we have a solid foundation in place that should produce some exciting results."

SPRINTS/HURDLES

Men: The Seahawks return veteran sprinter Steve Beasfield, who owns six individual records and four team relay marks at UNCW. New to the program are promising freshmen Terrell Macklin and Chris Bailey. Harder Jos Lenore returns and will be joined by freshmen Freddy Gaines and John Fernandez, two of the best high school hurdlers from their respective states last year.

Women: The Lady Seahawks lose veteran Nicole DeLaine, but bring in solid newcomers hoping to fill the void, including freshmen Chi Wilkins, nine-time state champion Sara White, Delisa Howard, Teressa Sumpter and Cynthia Peters.

DISTANCE

Men: UNCW returns conference champion Tim Cox, Doug Liming, Frank Ingrassia and Jeff Tieg. Newcomers include Nick Thibodeaux, Thomas Coughlin, Brad Sullivan and Finn Helms. Together, they will attempt to fill the void left by veteran Sam Bobbitt.

Women: The women's squad loses Amy Jackson, but returning All-Conference performer Heather Feston, Tricia Callison, Tracy Webb and Deirdre Heyde. Freshmen looking to contribute include state champion Winifred Winslow, relay All-American Shannon Williamson, LaShundra Carter, Sonja Pitts and Andrea Rothman.

JUMPS

Men: The Seahawks add depth in jumping events with the addition of indoor and outdoor state champion Michael McDuffie (triple jump/long jump), Joseph Hardee (long jump), Matthew Moore (high jump), Robbie Moss (high jump), Cameron McVie (N.C.'s top pole vaulter) and Mark Graham (pole vault).

Women: All-state Freshman Monique Bryant will be joined by newcomer Sara White, Cynthia Peters and Chi Wilkins, all of whom will compete in jumps at secondary events.

THROWS

Men: Sophomore Michael Anderson will compete in throws along with freshman Dan Keltner, the state champion and record holder in the discus (166-7) at Farmville Central High School. Freshman Joe Hardee will also add depth in the javelin.

Women: Freshmen Kim Woller and Chi Wilkins will handle throwing duties for the Lady Seahawks. Both have shown progression from fall training.

Senior Athlete Profile

BY JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Kim Bush, a guard for the UNCW Women's Basketball team, is the only senior on this year's team. Kim is majoring in Biology and Medical Technology and will graduate this coming May.

Kim grew up in Ohio where she became involved with basketball, playing with her two cousins who now play college basketball. Kim was on her first basketball team during the fifth grade and played on teams ever since. In the middle of her Junior year in high school, Kim's family moved to Tarboro, North Carolina which is where she discovered UNCW. Although Kim was recruited by other colleges, UNCW was the first university she saw and that was enough for her to make a decision. "I loved the campus; I loved the people; I loved the team; and the school was the perfect size," commented Kim of her initial impression of UNCW.

The basketball program has positively developed over Kim's four years as a Lady Seahawk. The major change is the attitude of the entire team. Kim's first couple of years, she had to push herself because there wasn't any senior guards to look up to. There was a big turnover of players. Now that there are more players staying with the program, everyone is starting to play together and look up to the veterans on the team. Kim devotes much of this progress to the new coaching staff this year. Coach Yow has been developing an excellent program for the Lady Seahawks, which is demanding for the players. "We learned to become more patient because of the new coaching staff. The coaching now sticks to what they say, and we know exactly what the want," highly spoke Kim. This year's coaches are very intense, are very fundamental, and always have positive principles. Kim feels that this year is the best program she has experienced as a Lady Seahawk.

Going into her final season, Kim has high expectations for the team. She states, "We need to play together to improve as a whole. Basketball is a team sport, so if one person is off the whole team is off." Kim expects herself this year to "push the younger ones and to teach them." She believes that the team needs to play hard and have fun since basketball is a sport.

Kim feels she has benefited from being on an athletic team during her college career. "I've learned a lot about life. It's like being on a job with a boss and coworkers. If you don't do your job you get fired. If you don't do your job well you put more pressure on them," states Kim. It has also taught Kim to deal with frustration and injuries. It has made her calmer in stressful situations "because you have to think so fast and react quickly to whatever is thrown at you."

After graduation Kim hopes to go to Medical Technology School in June for a year. She would like to use this as a stepping-stone for Medical School or to go into forensics (FBI). Kim has also thought about research in nutrition or going to work in a hospital somewhere. "I will decide when I get there, but I always wanted to be a doctor," comments Kim about her future plans. Kim would like to coach a youth basketball team someday also.

Debbie Sherman has been very influential for Kim during her career at UNCW. "She is the reason I came here. She was very influential and nice during my recruiting trip," states Kim. Kim can always count on Debbie to help her through any problems that might arise. Kim's parents have also been very supportive of Kim in everything she does. Kim comments, "They are great. They make me laugh and keep me in there when I get discouraged."

Kim reflects on her days at UNCW by saying, "It's been an experience. It wasn't totally frustration or totally happy."

Holiday Inn Beach Blast

BY JIM CLARK
Staff Writer

The Lady Seahawks knew going into the Holiday Inn Basketball Beach Blast '94 tournament they couldn't have any let downs if they wanted to be competitive.

Unfortunately, they got off to a bad start in their first round match-up against Appalachian State. The Lady Seahawks didn't score in the first five minutes of the game and found themselves down 15-0.

Over the last 35 minutes of the game, UNCW outscored the Lady Mountaineers 54-50, but when that 5 minutes in figured back in, the final read ASU 65-UNCW 54.

The Seahawks struggle in the first half was best represented by the fact they managed only 15 shots (making 5) and shooting 33%. ASU shot 50% from the field and missed 15 shot (of 30).

The other first round match-up saw Georgia Southern University's Andrea Autrey score a tournament record 31 points in leading the Eagles to a 83-71 victory over the LaSalle Explorers.

GSU went on a 19-4 run midway through the second half to go ahead for good and cruise into the championship game.

In the consolation game, LaSalle used an 18-3 run in the second half to pull in the Seahawks and send them to their seventh loss of the season (1-7). The Explorers improved to 9-3 as Lori Spurling and Mary Heller scored 12 points each in the 62-51 victory.

UNCW was led by Johnson's 17 points. Horton added 12. Horton was UNCW's only member of the All-Tournament Team. Also named to the team were Mary Heller (LaSalle), Janice Johnson (GSU), Andrea Autrey (GSU), Penny Robertson (ASU). The Tournament's most outstanding player was ASU's Angela Crosby.

INTRAMURAL BASKETBALL IS BACK!!

Registration for Intramural Basketball is underway and Wednesday, January 19 is the final day (No Exceptions!) There will be a Competitive and a Recreational division again this year so everyone will have a good chance of being chosen. The Competitive division should be wide open with the defending champion, Argonne, losing key starters to graduation. The Recreational division will feature returning champs, Full Force. Good luck to all teams in the upcoming season.

CONGRATULATIONS

Congratulations to juniors David Adam and Randy Davidson. Dave and Randy were selected as two of the top 20 All-American officials at the National Flag Football Championships in New Orleans over Christmas Break. This is tremendous honor because there were 102 officials working the 180 team tournament. They had the opportunity to officiate an exhibition flag football game in the Super Dome just hours before the Super Bowl. Congratulations!!!

INTRODUCING...Sunday Night Volleyball!!! This league will be a 4-on-4 format, open to men, women and co-rec teams. Games will be played on Sunday nights between 6 and 10 p.m. Get your friends together and register by January 26.

ASU trailed 28-25 at the half and after seizing the lead, but took the lead for good when they went on a 15-5 run with eight minutes to go in the game.

The game was a battle of scoring runs. ASU led 20-8 with 11 minutes to go in the first half, but GSU went on a 20-5 run to assure the lead at the break.

ASU improved its record to 6-4.

GSU (5-5) was led by Janice Johnson's 15 points and 10 rebounds.

LOS ANGELES

— Leading insurance groups said Tuesday that damage from Monday's earthquake will far exceed the record set in 1989 by the San Francisco quake. The 1989 quake was the U.S.'s most costly, at over $7 billion in damage. Insurers said Monday's quake damaged a larger number of homes and businesses and covered a larger area. The damage will be paid for by taxpayers, particularly that to roads and utilities not covered by insurance. About one-fifth of California's homeowners carry supplemental earthquake insurance. The quake left thousands homeless and 34 dead.

WASHINGTON

— Retired Admiral Bobby Ray Inman withdrew his nomination for Clinton's Defense Secretary Tuesday. Inman blamed "modern-day McCarthyism," criticizing attacks on his character, record and reputation.

NEW YORK

— A Nassau County grand jury indicted Colin Ferguson on 93 counts this week. Ferguson is responsible for the shooting spree that took place on a Long Island commuter train in December, killing 6 and wounding 19.

WASHINGTON

— Iran Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said in his final report Tuesday that President Reagan was aware of his aides' attempt to cover up the scandal. Walsh said Reagan set the stage for the illegal activities. Reagan's Attorney General, Edwin Meese, denied that there was ever a cover-up.

PORTLAND, Ore.

— Figure skater Tonya Harding denied any involvement in the assault on Nancy Kerrigan in a press conference Sunday. Harding's body guard and two other men were arrested last week in connection with the attack. Law enforcement authorities said they have found no evidence Harding was involved. The assault may keep Harding off the Olympic team even if she isn't charged, according to U.S. skating authorities.

Can't We All Get Along ?

BY TREY CHEEK

Many college students learn as much in the dorm room about negotiation and problem-solving as they do in the classroom about Math, English or other college subjects. Most students in college who live on campus have had some disagreement with a roommate that has been difficult to resolve.

UNCW is initiating a new policy that may aid students in avoiding and resolving problems with roommates. The "roommate agreement" will set down guidelines for negotiation of problems between roommates, according to the Raleigh News and Observer.

The News and Observer quoted UNCW Director of Housing and Resident Life, Bill McCartney as saying, "They're coming in with different skills, or lack of skills, such as negotiating and dealing with other people. Roommates have to sit down and negotiate."

UNCW officials decided to start the agreements because many incoming students were from large homes where they had their own bedrooms and did not have to negotiate to use the family television or stereo, according to the News and Observer.

The agreements will get students to set guidelines on how the room will be kept clean, on sleep and study patterns and how problems will be handled and how the room will be used. The agreement also gets students to determine if they will share their food and clothes and how the roommates will handle tasks such as locking the door and taking out the garbage, the Raleigh News and Observer reported.

The right to have an undisturbed night's sleep, access to their room without pressure from their roommate to leave, freedom from intimidation, tidiness and use of their room for reading and studying are rights of on-campus students that the standard agreement lists, according to the Raleigh News and Observer.

The News and Observer reported that the first UNCW students who will be required to sign the agreement are those entering next fall. The contracts are not binding and can be renegotiated at any time. Students aren't currently allowed to have students of the opposite sex for overnight visits. However, the agreements will allow roommates to set additional rules on visitation.

Minority Achievement At UNCW

BY KRISTIE BROWN
Staff Writer

The UNC Board of Governors has ordered the 16 system constituents to place a greater emphasis on minority enrollment. By the year 2000, minority enrollment is projected to double.

According to the Office of Minority Affairs, as of the fall semester of 1993, less than nine percent of UNCW's student population were minorities. The approximate count was 529 African-Americans, 90 Hispanics, 35 Asians, and 30 Native Americans.

The Office of Minority Affairs is working with the Admissions Office to increase minority enrollment. They are accomplishing this in several different ways. Ralph Parker, Director of Minority Affairs, sends letters to most of the minority students asking them to encourage their friends to attend UNCW. In addition, they utilize any and all media possible, such as the Seahawk and local papers, to attract potential students. If they hear of a certain student whom they believe will be an asset to UNCW, they meet with him/her to inform them of the academics and/or sports program that is of interest to them. Finally, minority scholarships and grants are offered. Minority Affairs and the Admissions Office inform prospective minority students of these scholarships and grants and how they can go about receiving them.

After the students are registered and attending classes, the question arises of how to keep them at UNCW. Several activities are currently geared to minorities. The activities include a mentor program, a tutorial assistance program, a fall get-together the North Carolina African-American Leadership Conference, and a minority award program. The award program is designed to award minorities for academic success, leadership abilities, as well as reinforce their work. Parker said, "I believe in doing what I can to help students have a positive experience on UNCW's campus."

Gerasimov Teaches At UNCW

This spring, Ambassador Gennadi Gerasimov is a visiting professor at UNCW in the Political Science and Communication Studies departments. He teaches a seminar called "Developments in Politics and Communication in Russia and the Soviet Union." The class meets on Monday and Wednesday from 5 - 6:15 p.m. in the Social and Behavioral Sciences building Room 220.

Gerasimov has had a successful career in journalism, starting as a contributor to New Times Weekly, worked for Trud Daily, and then for World Marxist Review in Prague, Czechoslovakia.

He served for three years as an advisor in the Central Committee of the Communist Party but returned to journalism and continued for many years as a syndicated columnist with Novosti Press Agency, spending almost six years in the United States in the seventies and early eighties when he became editor-in-chief of Moscow News Weekly.

As the perestroika period began, he was invited to join the USSR diplomatic service as the spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He has been the guest speaker on many United States and European TV programs regarding Russia and its changing climate. He has been guest lecturer at universities around the world.

In 1991, after President Yeltsin took office, Gerasimov was appointed USSR and later Russian Federation Ambassador to Portugal. During his service in Portugal he and his staff served as hosts for several international business-to-business conferences where he became known as a promoter of the development of small and medium business enterprises for Russia. Upon completion of his two year duty: the Lisbon post, he returned to Moscow. Since then, he has been active as a columnist and a speaker. After his return to Moscow in April, he was invited to Mexico and 13 cities in the United States as a lecturer and speaker.

Gerasimov has many journalist awards. In December, 1990, he was recognized as Communicator of the Year by the National Association of Government Communicators, the first non-U.S. media official to be recognized by NAGC.

In addition to teaching his seminars Gerasimov will be available during the semester for guest classroom and community lectures and as an on-going resource for comments on the Russian situation.

UNCW'S Room and Board Rates Soar to New Bounds

BY RENEE HILL
Staff Writer

Housing and Auxiliary Services have combined to increase the current UNC-Wilmington room and board rates 4.2% for the 1994-1995 academic year.

The expected 1994-1995 rates will be:

Double room.....$1,830	9 Meal Plan.....$760.00
Double suite.....$1,960	14 Meal Plan.....$830.00
Single suite.....$2,080	19 Meal Plan.....$900.00

UNCW's current housing rates are already among the highest in the UNC school system; with its meal plan costs only fourth from the top.

Director of Auxiliary Services, Charles Maimone said, "We are trying to maintain competitive rates in the UNC school system, and to stay within range within range with the apartment complexes in the Wilmington area."

Most of UNCW's buildings are relatively new. The Auxiliary Services building, the suites, apartments and residence halls, except for Galloway Hall, are not yet paid for, and the debt is high.

Housing and Auxiliary Services are self-generated operations. This means that they op-

The current 1993-1994 rates:

Double room.....$1,050	9 Meal Plan.....$725.00
Double Suite.....$1,150	14 Meal Plan.....$790.00
Single Suite.....$1,260	19 Meal Plan.....$870.00

erate solely on the money that they bring in.

Reason for the increase: There is an anticipated freshman class of 1,250. In addition to the projected number of returning students, the expected rate of occupancy will be 90% for the 1994-95 academic year. This, Housing and Auxiliary Services will have to operate on 10% less income. The increase in room and board will offset the projected low occupancy rate.

Maimone said, "We will have to care how we spend money. We will have to be sure that we have enough revenue to pay our expenses."

UNCW Hits The Stage With Its Masters Program In The Arts

BY MARNIE ELDRIDGE
Staff Writer

For those of you searching for a master's program regarding the arts, let your quest go no further than your own back door.

Beginning in the fall of 1995, UNCW may offer a master of fine arts program in creative writing and master's program in liberal arts. Though the programs hope to attract retirees and other non-traditional students looking to broaden their horizons, these two new masters programs may also attract many eager creative writing and liberal arts majors.

North Carolina has approximately 16 state-supported universities. Only three of these universities offer a masters of liberal arts: UNC Asheville, UNC Greensboro, and N.C. State. Of these three universities, only UNCW offers a masters of fine arts in creative writing.

Philip Genard, Director of Creative Writing at UNCW, feels that UNCW will attract the coastal and eastern creative writing students with the new MFA program, whereas UNCW magnets more of the western to centrally located students.

"Our program," he said, "is designed for those students seeking their masters of fine arts in creative writing. It is a special combination of writing, literary and language courses. It will not only focus on enhancing one's writing skills, but incorporate knowledge of literature and language as well, sending forth a more well rounded and smarter writer."

The MFA is recognized as a terminal degree and will require twice as many hours as a Masters degree in writing. Though the proposal has yet to be approved by the state, it has gotten the university's preliminary okay to prepare for planning. "Now it's just time to do our homework," says Genard.

The staff hired to teach the MFA graduate level courses aims to be no less than top notch. The program targets creative writers wanting to teach at the university level, as well as to be published.

Dr. McNab, Department Chairperson of Foreign Languages and Literature at UNCW, who proposed the masters program regarding liberal arts, feels that they still have a long way to go. "Our program is targeted to those who are already employed and are looking to enhance their liberal arts education. Getting a masters in liberal arts is not so much career-related as it is character-building, polishing one's communication and problem solving skills."

Though this program does not look to be off the ground before the fall of 1996, McNab has received a lot of outside interest from practicing lawyers and medical personnel who are looking to add to their degrees. The liberal arts program offers courses in humanities, arts and social sciences.

The AIDS Quilt Raises $9,104.40

By KRISTY SHUMAKER
News Editor

Assistant Director for Health Promotions Deborah Haywood presented an earnings check Wednesday for $9,104.40, raised from the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt. Haywood presented the check on behalf of the Cape Fear Host Committee to Nina Brown, a GROW representative. GROW will use the money to care for people living with HIV/AIDS in our area. The Quilt was at UNCW Oct. 22-24. Four thousand people came to view the Quilt. The Office of the Chancellor, Division of Student Affairs, Chi Phi and numerous other organizations donated money to help bring the Quilt to UNCW. Merchandise such as T-shirts, buttons and posters was also sold to raise funds. "We brought the Quilt here to heighten awareness of AIDS and we did that in a very meaningful way," Executive Director of University Relations Mimi Cunningham said Wednesday. "I think the people who went and saw the Quilt and panels were very moved," she said. "It was like a spiritual experience in there." GROW has served over 180 families, including transporting patients to medical facilities at UNC, Duke and Fayetteville.

Study Says There Are Jobs

By College Press Service

EAST LANSING, Mich. — The hiring of new college graduates is expected to increase this year after a five-year lull, a survey by Michigan State University found. The survey, done by the Collegiate Employment Research Institute at Michigan State, found that hiring should increase 1.1 percent. The figure was based on the responses of more than 600 business, industry and government organizations nationwide. The message to new college graduates is that there are job opportunities available," survey author L. Patrick Scheetz said at Concordia College in River Forest, Ill. The Recruiting Trends survey also projects an increase of up to 1.6 percent in starting salary offer to new graduates. Highest among the starting salaries for students with a bachelor's degree are chemical engineering, $40,341; mechanical engineering, $35,369; nursing, $29,868; and geology, $28,414. Employer categories expecting the greatest increase in hiring include hospitals and health care services; aerospace and components; and banking, finance and insurance. "We have a long recovery ahead to dig our way out of the job losses of the last four years," Scheetz said.

Race Matters

WASHINGTON—In the mystery novel "Trent's Last Case," there is a scene in Simpson's restaurant in London where Trent asks his companion to speak softly when ordering a glass of milk in that posh place because the head waiter has a weak heart. Let us hope the Americans with hearts as weak as that head waiter's did not notice their government's behavior last week.

The Clinton administration faced a crucial decision concerning a Communist regime in Asia: What to do about North Korea making a mockery of treaty obligations en route to becoming a nuclear power? By week's end the administration had salt sternly with a Communist regime in Asia. It had taken "bold"—re will come to the source of that adjective anon—action to protect America from cheap Chinese textiles.

After the president said, "North Korea cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear bomb," des said he misspoke and really meant that North Korea could not be allowed to become a "nuclear power," meaning equipped with an unspecified number of weapons and an undefined delivery system. The lack of detail expedites U.S. temporizing. But last week the administration flexed its muscles where it evidently thinks muscle matters most. It acted against the menace of cheap clothes.

For years the United States has assigned quotas limiting textile imports in more than 3,000 categories from 41 nations. China allegedly is evading its quotas by transshipping through about 25 countries.

Mickey Kantor, U.S. trade representative, claims China shipped 3.6 million sweaters to Macao, the Portuguese enclave in China, where they were labeled "made in Macao" and shipped to America. Kantor also says that 625 million kilograms of Chinese towels for cleaning machinery were similarly shipped through Honduras. Honduras did cut the cloth into towels. Still, the horror, the horror.

Even supposing the labels were honest, how, one wonders, has our government's vigilance lapsed sufficiently to allow loopholes for Macao-made sweaters or Honduran towels? Never mind. Best not to give the bureaucratic beast ideas.

Are We Getting a Good Education?

A "wake - up call" has been issued to the nation's colleges and universities to evaluate the undergraduate education system. The Wingspread Group on Higher Education, led by former Senator and Secretary of Labor William E. Brock, is comprised of corporate CEOs, educators, labor leaders, former public office holders, a recent college graduate, and other close observers of higher education in the U.S.

The panel issued a 20,000 - word report claiming that too many colleges do not put undergraduate learning at their first priority. It also cites a failure to instill individual and community values in students.

The report wants four things from colleges. It wants them to: Evaluate themselves against a 42 - point self assessment checklist and publicize a plan to build on their strengths and improve their weaknesses.

Define and publish standards of college entry and exit and develop ways to measure institutional and student progress toward those standards.

Develop a required core curriculum to assure students a broad liberal education in addition to professional education.

Assure "that next year's entering students will graduate as individuals of character, more sensitive to the needs of community, more competent to contribute to society, and more civil in habits of thought, speech and action."

Why has this challenge been issued? Wingspread calls undergraduate education "a prescription for decline." Brock says, "Unless higher education meets these challenges we will have a society which won't be able to compete in an increasingly competitive global economy. The simple fact is that some facilities and institutions certify for graduation too many students whose intellectual depth and breadth are unimpressive and too many whose skills are inadequate to success in contemporary life." Wingspread equates today's universities to expensive high schools.

This could easily be considered an attack not just on higher education, but on the country's colleges themselves. There are problems everywhere. Some are obviously worse than others.

There are teachers at UNCW who are failing in their attempts to educate students. How many times have you heard someone say, "I never passed a single test and I got a C in that class. The professor must like me." Too many times. Fortunately, UNCW also has a lot of good teachers too. Some of the best classes I've taken have also been the hardest classes I've taken. I think for the most part, students want to learn, even if it takes some effort. Students obviously want good grades, but they want to learn and be challenged as well.

I, for one, don't want to graduate with a high GPA only to find out I know nothing when I go job hunting.

We are lucky to have a chancellor who puts an emphasis on undergraduate learning and high standards of admission and graduation. We could be at a school like Carolina where many classes are taught by graduate students or teaching assistants because the professors are off doing research somewhere. Sure, UNC Chapel Hill is a more prestigious school than UNCW, but is the education really better?

How does UNCW stack up to this report?

LACK OF FOCUS

Calling All Single Mothers

WASHINGTON—"Why don't you write a column in praise of single mothers?"

The call, from Mary Frances Berry, was in response to another of my columns on the importance of marriage and the danger of the trend toward the superfluous father.

"Fatherless households," I had written, "are, in general, the poorest households in America. And even where money is not an issue, children are—again in general—significantly better off in intact families than in single-parent families."

Berry, chair of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and professor of American studies at the University of Pennsylvania, thought she saw a trend in my writings: Too much attention to father-absence, too much blame (for crime and violence and other social problems) laid at the feet of single mothers and too little acknowledgments of the contribution—even the heroism—of many of these husbandless parents.

Her own mother was a single parent, she reminded me, and so, for a time, was Jesse Jackson's and Bill Clinton's and so many others. "We didn't commit crimes," she said. "We turned out to be pretty responsible citizens. Why don't you offer a word of praise for the single mothers who raised us? Why don't you write a column in praise of single mothers?"

There followed what one might, describe as a half-hour of vigorous (albeit good-natured) discussion, during which each of us gave a bit of ground.

She said she agreed with my general support of marriage, but thought my generalizations about fatherless households a disservice to women like her mother. I said I thought her suggested praise of single mothers ran the danger of seeming like an endorsement of single motherhood.

She said she knew—and so did I—mothers who had done a terrific job of raising their children without any help from husbands and fathers. I said she was correct and, further, that we both knew two-parent households that had made a hash of child rearing. But how did that detract from my basic point that children, speaking generally, of course, are better off with both parents?

She persisted. I resisted. We agreed to think some more and then talk again. Here's what she had to say when I called her the other day:

"Surely the number of female-headed households has increased enormously since the time when you and I grew up, and so, coincidentally, has the amount of crime and violence. But you know what's interesting? There are no data showing that violence can be attributed to female-headed households. I checked with the Justice Department and other sources, and they simply can't make a connection."

It may be, I offered, that one reason the statistical connection between fatherlessness and crime hasn't been made is that nobody has tried to make it. Maybe it just seems too obvious.

It's not at all obvious, she countered, that marriage is a cure for crime or social pathology or anything else except singleness.

As with most of these debates, we're probably not arguing about much. She doesn't want existing single mothers saddled with the blame for all that's gone wrong in the society—both because it's not true and because it's not helpful. It's better to think of ways to provide assistance, in money and morale, for these hard-pressed families than to accuse them. I agree with that.

I worry that doing the best we can do to reduce the disadvantages of single parenthood, whether through the government or through churches and other voluntary associations, entails the risk of increasing the number of single-parent households. And she agrees with that.

We aren't even very far apart on what she insists is her basic point: "The data show that the best defense (against trouble-prone children) is not marital status but whether the custodial parent supervises the child and disciplines the child and is able to promote a central cohesiveness—a sense of family."

Of course, I say, "But aren't all these things more likely to happen in intact families?"

That set up her best line. "If all the single mothers in poor communities married single men in those same communities, and the men all moved in, the only effect would be to increase by one the number of disabled people in each household."

The rejoinder (though I was too slow to think of it at the time) is that two-parent families are for children what a seat belt is to the occupant of a car. It may occasionally keep you from escaping a dangerous situation, but on the whole it is far more likely to keep you safer and healthier. And, no, if the wreck has already happened, the seat belt won't fix a thing. But does that mean that buckling up isn't a good idea?

Columnists always get the last word.

Drop That Sweater or We'll Shoot

WASHINGTON—In the mystery novel "Trent's Last Case," there is a scene in Simpson's restaurant in London where Trent asks his companion to speak softly when ordering a glass of milk in that posh place because the head waiter has a weak heart. Let us hope the Americans with hearts as weak as that head waiter's did not notice their government's behavior last week.

The Clinton administration faced a crucial decision concerning a Communist regime in Asia: What to do about North Korea making a mockery of treaty obligations, en route to becoming a nuclear power? By week's end the administration had dealt sternly with a Communist regime in Asia. It had taken "bold"—re will come to the source of that adjective anon—action to protect Americans from cheap Chinese textiles.

After the president said, "North Korea cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear bomb," aides said he misspoke and really meant that North Korea could not be allowed to become a "nuclear power," meaning equipped with an unspecified number of weapons and an undefined delivery system. The lack of detail expedites U.S. temporizing.

But last week the administration flexed its muscles where it evidently thinks muscle matters most. It acted against the menace of cheap clothes.

For years the United States has assigned quotas limiting textile imports in more than 3,000 categories from 41 nations. China allegedly is evading its quotas by transshipping through about 25 countries.

Mickey Kantor, U.S. trade representative, claims China shipped 3.6 million sweaters to Macao, the Portuguese enclave in China, where they were labeled "made in Macao" and shipped to America. Kantor also says that 625 million kilograms of Chinese towels for cleaning machinery were similarly shipped through Honduras. Honduras did cut the cloth into towels. Still, the horror, the horror.

Even supposing the labels were honest, how, one wonders, has our government's vigilance lapsed sufficiently to allow loopholes for Macao-made sweaters or Honduran towels? Never mind. Best not to give the bureaucratic beast ideas.

The government asserts that China is transshipping $2 billion of textiles products. This seems implausible to citizen James Bovard, a one-man truth squad who is more than a match for tendentious legions of protectionists in American government and industry. He says the $2 billion figured is somehow derived from an investigation begun in 1991:

"The Customs Service brought in two busloads of agents to raid importers' offices in the Empire State Building. Hundreds of thousands of documents were seized, file clerks were held at gunpoint: "Drop that sweater or we'll shoot!"—and many companies' operations were severely disrupted. Yet, after years of investigations, the Customs Service has secured guilty pleas regarding the import of only $2.7 million." A far cry from $2 billion.

Kantor says the government's action barring more than $1 billion of Chinese goods (A) will have "little if any impact on American consumer" and (B) will save many thousands of American jobs. Proposition A seems patently absurd. And if there is a shred of truth to proposition B, proposition A must be false. Impeding the import of inexpensive textile products will save some American textile jobs only if the impediment, by preventing U.S. consumers from buying the more than $1 billion of Chinese goods they otherwise would have bought, forces them to pay substantially higher prices for American-made goods.

Protectionism advances beneath a fog of careless or ideologically loaded language. Nations that open their markets to foreign goods are said to have made "concessions." Why is it a "concession" to give one's citizens an expanded range of choices for cheaper goods that enlarge the reach of the citizens' incomes? And what of U.S. "retaliation" against China: We are "retaliating" against China's ability to satisfy the preferences of American consumers?

Thundering headlines (The Washington Post, "U.S. Moves to Punish China"; the New York Times, "A Punitive Move"; the Los Angeles Times, "U.S. Cracks Down") obscure the fact that the people being punished include American consumers, especially low-income buyers of the cheapest apparel. However, if North Korea ever loads an ICBM nose cone with cheap sweaters, it will be in deep trouble.

The American Textile Manufacturers' Institute is a lobby for an industry whose record profits in 1992 were, Bovard says, five times higher than the average U.S. manufacturer's earnings on sales. The Institute issued a statement of rupture about the U.S. government's "bold" action.

Boldly twisting bad laws? Boldly fattening a prosperous interest group? Speak such nonsense softly, out of consideration for people as sensitive as Simpson's head waiter.

A Ryder Survey Says!

A survey by Ryder, the nation's largest rental and leasing company, reports that Wilmington is the tenth most popular city in the country to move to with a population under 100,000. For every 120 people who to the area, only 100 move away.

Charlotte is the sixteenth most popular city with a population over 100,000. For every 116 people who move to the city, only 100 move away. Jerry Riordan, president of Ryder

A Look At: Floods, Fires, Hurricanes and Earthquakes

Floods, Fires, Volcanoes, Blizzards, Hurricanes, and now Earthquakes.... The branch Davidian survivors are going on trial for murdering four federal agents. The moose on Northern Exposure died. The U.S. Department of energy recently announced that they did secret radiation experiments on unsuspecting patients for years without telling anyone. Eyes are focused on a Virginia courtroom where housewife Lorena Bobbitt divulges the events leading up to an untimely prunting accident. And now, as if all this isn't enough, I learn that according to United States Department of Agriculture officials, the world's tomato crop is in jeopardy.

Friends, I don't care if you pronounce it "tomato" or "tomato," it's pretty bad when scientists begin predicting the decline of such a popular fruit. According to Dr. James Duffus (and I PROMISE you I'm not making this name up), a researcher with the USDA, "an unidentified virus spread by the greenhouse whitefly could eventually devastate crops worldwide." Growers in Orange County, California have already had to abandon this year's crops in order to try and thwart the virus. I'll keep you all informed as this one develops.

The point of all this is not to keep you up to date on all of the up to date findings of Dr. Duffus (I'm serious, that was the name given in the original article in the Wilmington Morning Star) and his Agriculture cohorts. The point was to show that we are living in troubled times and that there are a lot of bad things going on, leading to a sort of Armageddon kind of picture. BUT.... despite all of these bad things, I have good things to talk about this week.

First off, I recently had the opportunity to make my acting debut on the big screen. Yes friends, I now await receipt of an academy award (to place beside my NoBull Prize) for my portrayal of an ambitious young bellboy, driven by the desires of success and upward mobility on the career ladder to utter the unforgettable words "may I take your bags, sir" to actor Anthony Hopkins who portrays a man checking into a hotel and wishing the bellboy would shut up take his bags. That's not exactly how it went, so I guess you'll all have to wait until The Road To Wellville comes out later in the year. Look for me in the gray and red bellboy uniform in the background of a scene which lasts a hearty six seconds, if they decide to use it. I would certainly hope they do use this scene, considering it took two full days of shooting in subarctic temperatures and causing me to come down with a particularly virulent case of the Beijing Flu. Oh, the price of stardom; but didn't somebody say that everyone will be famous for six seconds?

Another good thing that happened to me was an invitation to a reception held at the Kenan House, which is Chancellor Leutze's home on Market Street. The reception was to facilitate contact and interaction between the Chancellor's office, the Board of Trustees, and the Student Body. I was invited as a representative of the students, as a journalist type person. The whole affair was pretty neat. I got to meet some really cool people who we normally see only in their business suits as they come and go to and from meetings and such.

I actually got to sit in the Chancellor's easy chair beside the Royal television. As I sat back and sipped on my Pepsi, I imagined that I were he, rared back in the lazy-boy watching the Seahawks whoop-up on James Madison. I imagined what it would be like to be such an important and powerful person, meeting dignitaries, and hosting countless receptions, and being at the helm of an up and coming University. I imagined having my own NoBull Prize winning television show, and traveling all over the world to film it. I imagined being admired and respected by students, faculty, and the general populace at large. And then... I woke up. One of the Chancellor's assistants, Mark Lanier, was tapping my shoulder and telling me that everyone had left and it was time to go home. Perhaps I had a little too much of the "dessert."

The HATT'S OFF award this week goes to SGA President Ziggy Nix as well as SGA Office manager Susie Goodrum for the great things that they do (i.e. invite me to receptions and such). Isay "Hat's Off" to you both for looking out for me. Thanks again.

The SHOE'S OFF award this time goes to The National Weather Service. If they are indeed a "service" as they claim to be, then they sure are lacking in providing decent weather. Let's see if we can't order up some above freezing temperatures for at least a few days next week.

Well, that about wraps things up for this edition. Be sure to tune in next time for more exciting news and insight. As always, your comments, criticisms and cash laden letters of encouragement can be addressed to me, here at The Fishwrap. Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is a NoBull Prize winning columnist with The Seahawk and he would love to be invited to YOUR reception.

Brown-Nosing Is An Art

We all joke about it, we all talk about it: brown-nosing. But, does it really exist?

Your first response, I'm sure, is hell yes. But I urge you to rethink your position on this—at least in the absolute sense of brown-nosing. Because, although it used to exist in the "apple for the teacher" form, I strongly believe brown-nosing is a dead art (ART being the operative word). To be politically correct, I reckon I ought to call this ancient apple polishing technique—alternative politicking. But, I won't, since when do I care about being politically correct?

Now, I can hear the chuckles from fellow classmates, you all know who you are. "June," you admonish me. "You brown-nose all the time."

Well, I beg to differ with you. I do not participate in any way, shape, or form in this insidious activity. I say what I want to in class, not to flatter the professor with my attention, but because (a) I suffer from an overly active verbal ability, (b) I am honestly interested, (c) I'm bored and need to do something to stay awake and, finally, (d) I paid good damn money to go to school here and I intend to get my money's worth.

Now, as to (d), I have proof. In one of my classes a professor swore the 'd' gave me an A and $500 if I'd just shut up and quit asking questions. There was a classroom full of witnesses to this astounding offer. Being obstinate, I didn't shut up (she never paid me the $500), but I did earn an A—because I worked and earned it. Now that we've done away with your objections to my perceived brown-nosing, let's look at why this fine art is dying. First, it's mostly due to the student's relationship with the professor or, at the least, the student's perception of that relationship. Students generally view their professors in one of two basic versions: the professor as a "god" or the professor as a big bad-asser.

However, what is most imperative to remember is that your professor is a human being. Along with being human, as we all know, is the need to go to the bathroom (professor or student, everyone has to drop their britches). Further, your professor has other normal concerns like the rest of us: males worry about whether or not their fly is zipped as they stand in front of roomful of students; and hey, be fair, what do you think females worry about every month? Fairly obvious human worries, wouldn't you say?

So, no, your professor is not a god. They have earned their degrees and you should respect that, but talk to them as though they're human. A bolt of lightning is not going to descend from the sky and bite your butt.

As for Professor Bad-Ass, are you always a real pleasant person to get along with? Maybe your professor has a wedgie and wants to load you down with work in order to get the hell out of the room and un-wedge. Maybe someone stole the raisins out of the raisin bran this morning. And it's just possible your professor has to write a major paper to present just like you do and is now contemplating a sabbatical on Mars to escape. Who knows? Again, the point is that the professor is human.

If you are bound and determined to draw positive professional attention to yourself, try to be somewhat reasonable about what you say. I've overheard such awful efforts at brown-nosing I cringe in shame for the poor soul attempting it. For example, in a non-required senior level class: "I've never understood [subject]. It's like, whoosh, over my head." It's beyond comprehension why this person even registered for the class.

"This is my favorite class, but I cut it because I had to write a paper for another class." That one will certainly inspire understanding!

This one really burns me. "I didn't read the assignment or do the homework 'cause I'm to busy, I work." Give me a break, who the hell doesn't work?

"I know I've missed ten classes, but like I really need a C to graduate." Like, poor baby. I need to go to Cancun and do tequila slammers, may I have a C, too?

"My paper's three weeks late 'cause I couldn't get in at the computer lab." Yeah, right.

Obviously, none of these efforts was worth the energy it took the energy it took the students to spit them out. It's a rough world out there, so if you're going to brown-nose, think fast, but be careful what you're saying. The least you can do is try some originality. Of course, honesty is always the best policy and I, myself, would never ever resort to such a devious activity.

Whoa, I've gotta go now, I see one of my professors coming this way. "Doc, hey, Doc...."

Homecoming 1994
Comedy

Tickets for this incredible Homecoming Comedy Show 1994 will go on sale starting January 25, 1994 at the Information Center Desk. The show will be Wednesday, February 9th, 1994 at 7:00pm in the University Center Ballroom. Tickets will be $3.00 for students and $5.00 for the general public.

Dave Chappelle is by far the most talented young comedian to come to the national scene in the last ten years. Originally from Washington, D.C., where he attended the nationally renowned Duke Ellington School for the Arts, Dave became a veteran comedian working all the comedy clubs and winning the "Funniest Comic in D.C." award.

After graduating, Dave moved to New York City and in a few short months, he took the comedy world by storm. By the age of eighteen, he had taped over eight national television shows. Even more impressive is the fact that he is the youngest comedian to ever perform on all of these shows. Recently, Dave just taped his first network television pilot for Fox called "Legionnaires."

He has also just landed a supporting role in "Clock & Dagger" (a movie slated to be released by MGM) featuring Kathleen Turner and Dennis Quaid. Presently, Dave can be seen headlining clubs and colleges across the country.

As one of the head writers for Saturday Night Live and as a national headliner, Warren is one of the nation's up and coming stars. It all started when Warren won the merit comedy search with topics ranging from his Grandmother's remarkable memory for lottery numbers, to his father being a Muslim. Warren Hutcherson touches on subjects seldom heard in comedy, and makes you wonder why.

Originally from Baltimore where Baltimore Magazine reviewed his act as "Better than the imported headliners." He became such a hometown favorite that a local car dealership hired him as a spokesman in their commercials.

Since then, this young comedian has reached new heights. In just his first year after moving to New York, he has taped over seven national television shows and has garnered favorable reviews in every New York daily including The Village Voice, Backstage, and Variety. Warren Hutcherson is looking for new worlds to conquer before his second year is up.

Roger and his new band, formed through the assistance of Tudor Records, has successfully learned to intermingle the traditional sounds of acoustic-folk with fresh progressive rhythms. Many of his original songs focus on the political and social issues relevant to our time.

Roger's most recent credits include showcases at both the New Music Seminar and the College Music Journal convention in New York City. He has also been featured on "BMI Live," a nationally televised program for new music artists.

Roger will be performing Thursday, January 27th from 7:00pm until 11:00pm in the Center

Hootie Blows
The MonkBy Sam Cuthrell
Entertainment Writer

Okay, okay, I admit it. I went to the Hootie and the Blowfish show at the Mad Monk last Thursday. I really should have stayed home and done some studying, but my overwhelming curiosity about this enigmatic band overpowered the little part of my brain labeled "Responsibility", and I ditched my ever-present "How to be a Communication Major 101" study guide for the evening.

Now before you all start in with "You actually PAID to see Hootie and the Blowfish?!", let me just tell you. You are probably the only person who wasn't there. After arriving at 10 p.m., I was astonished to see a line out the door of the Monk. Even more astonishing was the crowd that was already inside. By 11 p.m., you couldn't even turn around without bumping into some insanely happy-looking Hootie fan.

Cravin' Melon, the opening act, hail from South Carolina (Columbia, I think) put on a very good show (especially to be the opening band). Some of my more self-respecting friends decided that it would be a good idea to leave after Cravin' Melon finished their set. Wussies. I, however, threw all concerns about life, limb, and "loud obnoxious music" to the wind, and staying for the Hootie show.

Hootie and the Blowfish's music didn't do much for me, but I think it was mainly because the lead singer (especially to be the opening band). Some of my more self-respecting friends decided that it would be a good idea to leave after Cravin' Melon finished their set. Wussies. I, however, threw all concerns about life, limb, and "loud obnoxious music" to the wind, and staying for the Hootie show.

There was one thing I didn't understand, however, the kooks who decided to start a slam pit. Now come on, guys, this is Hootie and the Blowfish we're talking about here! If it had been Johnny Quest, I could have seen having a baseball-cap mosh, but this was the happiest love-your-neighbor music that I have ever heard.

It went so far as to force the Hootie lead singer (His name isn't Hootie, I hope) to ask everybody to take it easy. Unfortunately, the weirdoes weren't listening, and a couple of fights eventually broke out. Don't get me wrong - I'm all for a good slam pit - but the venue should be appropriate. When the lead singer actually stops after a song to tell you that this isn't slam dance-type music, maybe you should listen to him.

All things accounted for, Hootie and the Blowfish made for a good show - if you didn't like the music, you could always socialize with the other 1.2 million people there. And for all you guys in that "pit" - if you really want to impress your girlfriend, come back for the Onyx show.

BASEBALL PREVIEW

Swimming In D.C.

BY SHANNON MCBRIDE
Sports Writer

On their first outing of the new year, the UNCW women's swimming team split a victory, beating American University 132-110, while losing 141-102 to George Washington. On the other side, the men's team lost both meets 137-104 and 148-95 respectively.

Karla Zick was a standout for the women's team turning in excellent performances in three individual events. Zick won the 200 Individual Medley (2:13.48) and the 500 Freestyle (5:11.28), and placed second in the 200 Breaststroke (2:27.95).

Coach Allen was very impressed, saying that Zick swam "very good." She had a tremendous meet with outstanding performances. Karla swam her lifetime best in the 200 I.M. and come back to swim her fastest breaststroke in two years.

Other good performances and personal bests for the women were done by Jennifer Alverson in the 100 Freestyle and 200 Breaststroke, and Allison Hayden in the 500 Freestyle.

Allen was "pleased and happy with the girls." It was an "unexpected victory" against American who had placed second in the conference last year. Definitely an "outstanding afternoon."

On the men's side, Clifton Perkins put in his best seasonal performance in the 200 Individual Medley (1:57.86), and career best in the 200 Backstroke (1:57.61). Other fine performances were turned in by Doug Shanks, Greg Warren, and Mark Probeck.

Allen said, "We didn't perform well enough as a team, and key people didn't perform well enough for a victory."

This Saturday the team travels to Davidson, S.C. to swim Davidson and Georgia Southern.

"It should be an interesting meet," Allen said. The women will be challenged by Georgia Southern, but although it will be a tough meet, the women are capable of winning. The men, however, should beat both teams, because as of yet, neither have shown enough depth and quality.

Tales from the Dumpster

BY ERIK TOTTON

Does anybody here see a familiar scene? Once again those underachieving Bills are in the ACC Championship. I can't say a quick prayer that they lose. I'm no Chiefs fan but I don't think I could sit through a fourth Superbowl tramping of the Bills. Well - maybe I could sit through it - but I really don't want to. I can think of many things more enjoyable than that - like surgery for one. What do you think the odds would be in Vegas if the Bills made it to another Superbowl? If the odds were a cauldron to one it would still be too low. Does anybody really believe they could win it - I hope not.

Speaking of things that will never happen, does Michael Jordan really believe he has an ice cube's chance of the hot place of playing Major League Baseball? Come on Michael, you weren't even that good in high school. I doubt you could hit a Greg Maddux curveball if you swung at it with a double-wide trailer. Michael's good, but he's no Bo Jackson. If he really wants to play baseball he's better off taking the center field spot for the Minor League team in Wichita.

How about this Nancy Kerrigan mess? I think they should lock them all up and throw away the key. If you attack a FIGURESKATER you've got some serious problems and society would be a lot better off without you. I mean, what would be next for you - Synchronized Swimmers?

In closing, I've got to say something about our Cheerleaders. All of you remember that I complained when the Cheerleaders didn't get new uniforms - so I've got nothing against them but I have to say something. What the hell is this Green - Gold cheer I hear them doing? Do they really think anybody in their sane (or insane for that matter) mind is going to sit in the stands and yell GREEN! - GOLD! or whatever the hell it is? Here's just a little clue for them - the signs don't say - we just don't want to participate in those stupid cheers. But wait, there's more - don't do that cheer against George Mason - THAT IS THEIR TEAM COLORS! We were wearing Blue and White. I'm all for school spirit but come on, you cheerleaders can do better than that.

That's it for now, keep your head out of the Dumpster and don't forget - until next time - GREEN! GOLD!

Seahawks Win Again

BY ERIK TOTTON
Sports Editor

The UNCW Seahawk Men's Basketball team continued their unbeaten streak in the CAA with a 84-79 win over conference favorite Old Dominion (9-6, 2-2 CAA).

Moore, who finished with 16, hit a shot with 2:00 left for a 73-72 lead that Seahawks never let go. Plagued by free-throw shooting for much of the season, the Seahawks hit 9 of 10 late in the game followed by a dunk from El-Samadily to finish off Old Dominion.

The victory was important because not only did the Seahawks defeat the pre-season pick to win the league, but also the CAA co-champion from last year. Coach Kevin Eastman commented, "It was a powerful win in that we had to show ourselves we could win against a good basketball team on the road, this gets us to believe in ourselves a little bit."

Leading scorers for the Seahawks were Chris Meighn with 20, Corey Stewart with 16, and Darren Moore also with 16. John Spann made a major contribution off the bench with 12.

The Seahawks next game will be January 22 at James Madison University - who is also undefeated in CAA. The game is at 2:00 p.m. and will be televised on Home Team Sports.

Third-year coach Mark Scalf will be counting on a deeper talented pitching staff and an improved defense as the Seahawks enter their 17th season of NCAA Division I competition in 1994.

The Seahawks finished last season with a 26-29 overall record and 6-10 league mark after key injuries forced Scalf and assistants Jerry Meyers and Chuck Baldwin to scramble midway through the campaign. Depth will still be a problem, but the Seahawk skipper says a first-ever title in the Colonial Athletic Association is not out of the question.

"This year is no different than any other," he said. "We want to win the conference championship. As long as we remain healthy, I think we've got a more realistic opportunity to accomplish that than in recent years."

The Seahawks face one of their most challenging schedules in years, playing 24 of 55 games against teams that advanced to the NCAA Regionals last spring. With that in mind, Scalf says several factors must materialize for his club to have a successful campaign.

"I'm excited because we have a pitching staff that's capable of getting guys out," he says. "If the defense makes the plays, we should have a chance to win. Hopefully, we'll get a few surprises from the newcomers and some of the returnees will have career years."

Any discussion of the 1994 prospects starts with a pitching staff Scalf says "may be the best since I've been here." Despite losing fifth-round draft choice Heath Altman, the Seahawks will be led by dependable veteran Brian Smith and a good blend of experience and young talent.

"We feel like we have seven guys who can fill the role of starter, middle reliever or closer. We have a very consistent group. If we're healthy, we'll have good depth. There's not a tremendous drop from five to seven in the past."

Rebounding from elbow surgery, Smith started slow last season before returning to fashion a 4-5 record and 4.09 earned run average. The senior right-hander, who has appeared in 52 games in three seasons, should establish a school record this spring for most games on the hill.

"Brian has been as consistent as you can expect anybody to be throughout his career," says Scalf. "He enjoys the challenge and prepares himself for every pitching opportunity better than anybody on our staff."

Joining Smith as probable starters are Chris McBride (4.61 ERA, 6-4 W-L), Keith Pettus (4.48 ERA, 4-5 W-L), and freshman southpaw Jason Ramsey.

The loss of All-CAA receiver and draftee Corey Broome leaves a gaping hole behind the plate, but Scalf likes what he sees in freshman Tate Joyner. The 5-10, 150-pound Joyner was a two-time All-Conference catcher at Jordan High School in Durham, N.C., and was voted team MVP for the Falcons.

According to Scalf, "We'll definitely be inexperienced behind the plate. We don't have anyone to fill Corey's shoes and do all the things he could do for us offensively and defensively. We do believe, however, that Tate can handle the pitching staff and call a good game."

In the infield, McBride, also a first baseman, should have a solid junior year after starting 112 games his first two seasons at UNCW. The lanky infielder, co-MVP of Virginia's Valley League last summer, batted .281 last season with 30 RBI's and only six errors in 416 chances in the field.

"Chris will play first on non-pitching days," Scalf said. "If he performs as well as he can, we think he could be a candidate for conference Player-of-the-Year. He needs to take his game up another notch and have an outstanding year."

Sophomore Marshall Cooper is leading the battle for the starting job at second base, transfer Pat Smith tops the depth chart at shortstop and Battle Holley has moved from second base to the hot corner.

Holley finished fourth on the team in hitting last year after batting .290 in 55 at-bats. The Thorax City, N.C., product struck out just 22 times in 217 at-bats.

New faces can also be found in the outfield as the Seahawks face a transition year. With veterans Kevin Hooker and Sal D'Esposito gone, Scalf will look to sophomore Kevin Robinson (261), junior Keith Holstad (194) for leadership.

"We should have a better defensive outfield," Scalf said. "We'll have improved range and arm strength. We'll also look to these guys to provide some offense."

Overall, the Seahawks will have average team speed, adequate power and solid defense. A tough schedule looms as the biggest obstacle as Scalf's club seeks its first CAA crown.

Senior Athlete Profile

BY JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Sherif El-Samadily from Cairo, Egypt is a senior center for the UNCW Men's Basketball Team. He will graduate this coming May with a degree in Marketing.

Sherif's dad, who is the basketball coach for the Junior National Team in Egypt, taught Sherif the game at age eleven. Sherif played for both the Junior and National teams in Egypt. Sherif attended an American University in Cairo his freshman year, then he asked for a chance to play basketball in the States. His coach for the National team (Coach Luther) knew Coach Eastman, and UNCW seemed to be his best available choice.

Sherif's first year at UNCW was a bit of a struggle for him because it was a different game at a different level of basketball than he was accustomed to. According to Sherif, basketball in Egypt is more of a hobby with not a lot of commitment involved. "Here basketball is a dominant game in every aspect. It was a change for me to get physical while playing my first year so I struggled," states Sherif. He owes a lot of his development to the coaching staff.

Sherif comments, "From day one they made sure I got to know everything around me. And on the court they pushed me harder than I'd ever been - tough mentally and physically." Coach Reynolds stresses lifting weights and getting stronger. Coach Maker stresses the mental strength of the game, and Coach Eastman coordinates it all together to get the "big picture." Sherif comments, "I worked on what I was told, and I hope to continue to get better this year too."

Over Sherif's three years at UNCW he saw a change in the development of the program. Sherif states, "Now there is a lot more discipline; the players are more together. There is more concern for the team opposed to individual. Everyone wants to win more." As the years went by, Sherif feels that you can see the development that has occurred, because Coach Eastman enforced being a strong structured team that really wants to win and everyone respected.

Sherif's expectation for the team this final season is to improve more this year with more of a desire to win. "We need to get working more and draw more attention to us and do some damage to other teams," optimistically adds

Sherif. Personally, Sherif would like his senior year to be special so people will remember him after he leaves.

After graduation Sherif is going back home after not seeing his family for two years. Then, if he gets a chance, Sherif would like to continue playing basketball somewhere. Sherif states, "If it doesn't work that way, I have my degree. I would like to take my ideas and methods I saw here in Marketing and apply some of it back home so my people can experience it. I think it would generate profit."

Everyone has been very helpful and supportive of Sherif during his career at UNCW. The professors in the Marketing Department were very understanding. "They helped me out and knew I missed class because of basketball. I try to do my job and do it the best I can," commented Sherif. His parents have also been as supportive as they can be being so far away. They have seen a couple of tapes and Sport Information sends them media guides. Although no one in his family has been to the States, Sherif hopes to see his dad for graduation.

Sherif also mentioned three people that have been very influential for him over his three years at UNCW. Sherif has built up a friendship with his teammate, Chris Meighn, who was his first roommate. "We suffered, struggled, and had good times together," comments Sherif. Coach Maker has helped Sherif out a lot through his struggling times and when he's feeling down. Also, Sherif comments highly of Mrs. Wendy Eastman who has been a good friend to talk to, especially when he felt homesick and to keep the family-side of things alive.

Sherif feels his inner quality of staying close to God has helped him in his basketball career. "Me being a Muslim, I'm closer to God than usual and being close to my family has helped me a lot also," states Sherif.

Sherif sums up his overall UNCW experience by saying, "It started scary, it got better. Now it's going great and I think it will soon be over and everything will just be a great memory."

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court dealt a blow to anti-abortionist groups Monday, ruling unanimously that protesters can now be prosecuted under federal anti-racketeering laws. To uphold the Racketeer Influenced, Corrupt Organizations Act, it must be proved that groups engaged in crimes such as harassment and assault. RICO may also apply to nuclear arms protesters, animal rights activists, civil rights demonstrators and others. Anti-abortionists called the decision a blow to anyone who protests anything.

WASHINGTON — President Clinton nominated William Perry for secretary of defense on Monday. Perry, 66, is currently deputy defense secretary, and served as a consultant in developing the stealth technology for U.S. weapons systems during the Carter administration. Members of Congress predicted Perry would win quick confirmation.

WASHINGTON — A federal judge ordered Sen. Bob Packwood to turn over his diaries to the Senate Ethics Committee on Monday. U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson said Sen. Packwood's diaries do not enjoy the Fifth Amendment privilege of immunity. Packwood is being investigated for alleged sexual misconduct, obstruction and witness intimidation.

WASHINGTON — President Clinton promised to line up federal aid for victims of last Monday's earthquake in California. Damage is estimated at more than $30 billion. State officials say they are looking to Washington to help shoulder the burden. Since last Monday, 2,500 aftershocks have been recorded at the California Institute of Technology. Meanwhile, residents returned to work on Monday via trains, carpools and buses. In other developments, electricity has been restored to all but 700 customers. Five thousand homes are still without water service and 30,000 are without gas.

PORTLAND, Ore. — Authorities said Monday that they may have enough evidence to arrest figure skater Tonya Harding in connection with the assault on Nancy Kerrigan earlier this month. The Oregonian newspaper reported that authorities have enough evidence but don't want to act until they are sure they can get a conviction.

HANOI, Vietnam — The U.S. is moving toward final resolution of Americans still missing from the Vietnam War. President Clinton has said the U.S. may lift the trade embargo against Vietnam if Hanoi cooperates in accounting for 2,238 missing Americans.

GENEVA, Switzerland — The 38-nation Conference on Disarmament is looking to take up nuclear arms next. The conference's annual meeting opened Tuesday. The groups want to expand to include North Korea, currently suspected of building a nuclear arms arsenal.

UNCW Ranked Third In Drug Violations

BY RENEE HILL
Seahawk Reporter

According to an annual illegal drug violation report, UNCW has the third highest number of violations for the 1992-93 school year. However, the numbers reported are not an accurate measure of campus drug use.

"This year, the numbers have increased," said Diane Edwards, coordinator of Alternatives!, a substance abuse education and prevention service at UNCW. "Many factors come into play for these numbers: what constitutes a violation, how enforcement is carried out and how it differs from one school to the next. These numbers go up and down because of the amount of vigor people put toward enforcement," said Diane Edwards.

Many incidents of drug abuse go unreported. Therefore, the numbers of violations reported may be considerably low. Assaults, larcenies and property damages often stem from drug use for the 1991-92 school year. Amanda Lease, a peer educator of Alternatives!, said, "The only thing we can do is to educate, provide options and make them look appealing. We've recently updated all of our files in order to provide a wide array of the most current information on alcohol and other drug abuse." Alternatives! also sponsors activities focusing on natural ways to get high including their annual tie-dye extravaganza and sailing trips. This semester Alternatives! will program to familiarize faculty and residence assistants with their resources. "This year we will operate a mocktail bar at the North Carolina African-American Students Leadership Conference, which begins on Feb. 5," added Andrea Erving, a two-year veteran peer educator at Alternatives!

In an ongoing effort to prevent the abuse of alcohol and other drugs at UNCW, Campus Police sponsors several programs. "Up In Smoke" is a program in which officers enter residence halls and take drug paraphernalia to display and explain to students what can happen to them if they are caught with such items.

"We don't lecture, look down on students, or make demeaning statements. We talk to them on their level," said Detective Shawn Thomas.

"Think Smart" is a program that features a real prisoner who Hate Speech In College: Censor or Educate?

BY TREY CHEEK
Seahawk Reporter

Over 200 years ago, our Founding Fathers wrote our United States Constitution and placed the Bill of Rights at the heart of our American rights. Of these rights, few Americans believe more fully in any than they do in the right to free speech that is guaranteed in the First Amendment.

However, many American colleges and universities are challenging the universality of this right by creating regulations that limit or ban student use of "hate speech."

In recent study at UNC-Chapel Hill, 36 percent of the 384 students surveyed were found to have regulations punishing hate speech, according to The Wilmington Star News.

Slurs, taunts, graffiti and many other forms of prejudice are most often considered as hate speech. This speech is often targeted at women, blacks, Asians, Jews and homosexuals.

Patricia Leonard, UNCW Dean of Students, said "UNCW does not have a hate speech policy. The university believes in freedom of speech, thus supporting the First Amendment rights of everyone. However, the university also acknowledges that there is such speech that is considered offensive to groups. The university's way of approaching this speech is primarily through education and intervention."

Leonard also said that the Code of Student Life Statement of Diversity specifies what is acceptable behavior by UNCW students. The code describes what is acceptable for UNCW students but does not prescribe punishments for actions outside the guidelines. Leonard said a problem arises when slurs are directed at an specific student and qualify as harassment interfering with the student's rights. Leonard said that no reports of hate speech have been made at UNCW. She said that if a report was made, the university would want to consider all mitigating factors in determining if the remarks were made as a statement of general opinion, or a personal slur intended for one individual.

"Our goal is to challenge versus censor," said Leonard.

Leonard quoted Georgetown University Law Professor Eleanor Holmes Norton, who said "If the university suppresses rather than takes on bigoted speech, it betrays our faith in the efficacy of education."

Leonard said that if any student feels that he or she has been the victim of hate language, the student should go to the Office of the Dean of Students and see her. She guaranteed that the complaint would receive a complete investigation.

The Constitution has guided Americans through many difficult times and situations. In a time of "political correctness" and fights for and against censorship of speech from the music stage to the campus, the Constitution has been called upon once again by all sides as a guide.

The First Amendment has been cited often in cases involving student speech. It seems to set a specific guideline - "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment...abridging the freedom of speech" - which says that no institution, including a college or university, can limit a person's speech.

However, the courts have ruled that the First Amendment does not provide a blanket of free speech over all people. In situations where a "clear and present danger" could be shown to exist, denial of free speech was allowed. Denial has also been allowed in cases where speech could be shown to intentionally provoke "lawless conduct." The Fourth, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments have also been cited in cases involving free speech on campus.

The Supreme Court has ruled in a line that seems to support the policies of most universities that regulate only speech which encourages a dangerous situation or lawless action.

The University of Michigan set some of the most stringent and challenged rules in regard to hate speech. The Court cited Broadrick v. Oklahoma (1979) in forcing the University of Michigan to change its policy because the policy was too unclear that "men of common intelligence must necessarily guess as to its meaning." Similar charges were brought against the University of Wisconsin by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Supreme Court set aside certain types of speech as exempt from coverage by the First Amendment in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942). The Supreme Court justice wrote in this case, "There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include lewd and obscene, profane, libelous, and insulting words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."

The courts have said that speech cannot be regulated because what is said is simply offensive. In Street v. New York (1969), the Supreme Court said, "It is firmly settled that under our Constitution the public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers."

To stand on either side of this issue seems to provide a clear view of what should be done. While we as college students have a right to learn peacefully in a regulated environment, it is important to remember the words of Justice Hugo Black in his dissent in Communist Party v. SACB (1961) that "freedom of speech, press, petition and assembly guaranteed by the First Amendment must be accorded to the ideas we hate, or sooner or later they will be denied to the ideas we cherish." If we can stand in the middle and regulate only speech that is absolutely necessary, as UNCW is doing, our society, and our school, will be better.

A Grateful Heart

As I watched the results of the California Earthquake as reported through the stories of the people who were involved, I became impressed once again about a common thread that appeared as the bottom line of so many stories. In the face of the loss of so much personal property the bottom line consistently (seems) to be a gratefulness for life. When death seems threateningly close and we survive, it seems that we find in the midst of fear and shock an undergirding grateful heart.

I found myself reflecting on my life and appreciating all the good things that are a part of my life that seem to be given to me through no real merit of my own. The problem that I think most of us have is that we lose touch with gratefulness in the static of our daily lives. We have so much going on and the demands of our day can carry a constant edge of tension so that our awareness gets overly focused on making it through the next task.

What we lose is a broader perspective on our life that allows a consistent sense of gratefulness. In the complaints about the cold "17 below with the wind chill factor" we lose touch with the wonderful crispness of the morning air, the clarity of colors in our natural world and the patterns of which we catch a glimpse of the frozen water of the front yard birdbath or the sheen on the tidal flats as we cross the bridge on our way to work. In the agendas of our meetings and our classes we get over-focused and lose the sense of the richness and depth of the personalities of the friends with whom we are working or studying. We get a cold or pull a muscle and get so focused on our complaints about feeling bad that we lose touch with the depths of love that are the foundations for those very relationships.

A tragedy like that earthquake is an incredible value clarification exercise for it confronts us starkly with a sense of what is important. But we do not need tragedies to clarify our values. We simply need the discipline of creating spaces for reflection and recollection in our daily lives, moments when [we] stop doing those things which are claiming our momentary attention and let our awareness expand to look at the world in which we live, to appreciate the goodness of our lives and the richness of our relationships, to appreciate feeling good, to be aware of the rich diversity of possibilities with which we are gifted; in short, to be simply and profoundly grateful for all the blessings of this and most days of our lives.

It is even possible to be grateful when hard times are upon us. Maybe we can't be grateful in the midst of personal failure or grief brought on by loss or illness, but we can become aware, as we reflect on such hard times

In our past, that we learn important stuff about ourselves and about life as we deal with tough times and tough issues. We are shaped and fashioned by so many struggles and one of them is our struggles. And the more that we cultivate a grateful heart, the more able we will be to look for the positive dimensions to be found in tough times.

In my case, the absolute rock bottom source of gratefulness is my awareness of God's love for me. In my faith system that is the source of all gratefulness for it is the source of all life and all possibility and all strength that allows us to endure.

Whatever the source of your gratefulness, I hope you will choose to find a way to enlarge your awareness so that you may enjoy the blessings of a grateful heart.

State of the Union

Well, what were you expecting? Of course I watched it. There was nothing else on. It was on every channel.

President Clinton has some mighty ambitious goals for this country this year. He wants to rework health care, welfare, and unemployment. In addition to these, he attacked crime and foreign policy.

Clinton wants mandatory life sentences for felons convicted of their third violent crime. I sure hope so! Violent offenders should be given life sentences after their first violent act. I'm talking about sentences that will keep them behind bars for the rest of their lives. I don't believe in plea bargains and sentences that let these people out on the streets after six years because they practiced good behavior in prison. If you are dangerous and like to hurt people, you need help and you need to be locked up.

Of course, I see problems with that scenario. I know it's not realistic, but it would sure make me feel safer at night.

I want to take this opportunity to plug the Campus Police Rape Aggression Defense program. I have signed up for the course and I encourage every other woman on this campus to do the same thing.

Clinton sounded very firm (and not nearly as hoarse as usual) about his goals. He told Congress he would not accept any bill that did not provide private health insurance for everyone. He said he would immediately veto such a bill. I think he even meant it. At least I hope he did. Everyone who needs health care should be able to get it. It's ridiculous that we live in one of the richest and most advanced countries in the world, and yet there are many people who are unable to get necessary medical attention because they can't afford insurance.

I realize it will probably be expensive, but I look at it this way: If someone I loved needed medical treatment and couldn't get it because they couldn't afford it...I just don't think you can put a price on health. If you don't have your health, what have you got? Sometimes clichés do say it best.

As I was watching Clinton's first formal State of the Union Address, I thought about the state of things in this country since he took office. He's had his share of problems and plenty of criticism, but I'm sure glad he's in office. I don't agree with everything Clinton says or does, but it could be a lot worse. Just think, we could still have Bush.

Among other things, he signed the Brady Bill into effect and helped to improve the economy. Then there's NAFTA. Although I'm inclined to think NAFTA is a good thing, I'll reserve judgment for now.

Between the years 1988 and 1991, there was an eight-month welfare reform would help people like these. He calls for re-employment, not unemployment. His plan includes job training and placement help for workers who have been laid off.

At any rate, I think most people agree that everyone deserves and should get health insurance. How this comes about will be interesting to watch.

Letter To The Editor:

To the parents and students of UNCW:

A recent article in the Seahawk, the student newspaper of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington incorrectly implied that room rates for the 1994-95 academic year were increasing from $780-$820. These figures that were reported in the January 20, 1994 edition of the Seahawk are in error. The reporter listed the combined room and board rate for 1994-95 as if it was the room rate alone.

Actual room rates will increase for 1994-95 year, but it is not anywhere in the range implied by this article. Approved room rates for next year are as follows: For comparison purpose, 1993-94 rates are also listed.

Type	Location	1993-94	1994-95
Double room	All Traditional Halls	$1050	$1070
Double suite	Suites	$1150	$1200
Single room	Apartments, Suites	$1260	$1320

As a result of the reporting error by the Seahawk, many students and parents are expressing concerns about our 1994-95 rates. As you can see from the information above, rate increases for 1994-95 will be minimal. In fact, almost 60 percent of our students will experience only a $20 price increase which is 1.9 percent over 1993-94 rates.

Those of us who work at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington are aware of the sacrifices and struggles that families endure to have a student in higher education. As such, we attempt to keep our costs at a minimum while providing all of the services that you and your student desires. It is this philosophy that guides our decisions on room and board recommendations to the Board of Trustees.

I am hopeful that this clarification is helpful to you as your family makes a decision on where your student will live next year. With room sign-up for 1994-95 just one week away, it is important that you have accurate information while making this important decision.

Sincerely,

William L. McCartney

Separation of Church and State, Has It Gone Too Far?

WASHINGTON—Even back in law school, Kevin J. Hasson didn't like the way the church-state debate was developing. "The whole issue has been framed by the American Civil Liberties Union and People for the American Way, on one end, and Pat Robertson and the American Center for Law and Justice, on the other," he said the other day.

That leaves a lot of room for thoughtful people to come in, Hasson says. But this vast middle of the ordinarily faithful—people who don't want the clergy running political institutions but who believe religion has an important role to play in public life—has hardly been represented in the legal battles over the establishment clause of the Constitution.

Enter Hasson. Or rather, Exit Hasson. He's leaving the powerful law firm of Williams & Connolly to found (with one other lawyer) the Becket Fund, a public interest law firm devoted to the defense of religious liberty.

Hasson, 36, thinks the trend in church-state jurisprudence has been in the wrong direction for some 50 years. The men who crafted the First Amendment's clause prohibiting Congress from making "law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" wanted to be sure that America avoided a government-established church, Hasson says.

"They wouldn't have dreamed they were banning Christmas trees, or the ability of people to pray in legislatures or to offer simple invocations at high school graduations. They merely wanted governmental neutrality with regard to religion."

But, says this young Catholic conservative and former staffer of the Reagan Justice Department, there are two "orders of magnitude" regarding neutrality: Neutrality as among religions and neutrality as between religion and irreligion.

The first, according to Hasson, was what the framers had in mind and what America practiced for most of its constitutional history. "The rules weren't that complicated. The government couldn't give money to Catholics that wasn't available to Baptists, or state official ceremonies with an Islamic prayer to the exclusion of everything else."

But then came the doctrine introduced by Justice William O. Douglas that holds that government must not merely avoid favoring one religion over another but also must avoid favoring religion in general. The inevitable result, says Hasson, is outright hostility to religion.

The earlier doctrine might lead to the outlawing [of] official prayers in public schools, for instance, on the ground that no one could compose a prayer sufficiently neutral to pass muster with Muslims, Christians and atheists; that's neutrality. The latter doctrine forbids an official "moment of silence" during which school children might pray. That's hostility.

And Hasson believes it has implications far beyond commencement exercises and Yuletide creches.

"It's corrosive to our culture," he says. "The Judeo-Christian heritage has been the underpinning of the Western culture, including specifically the American culture. Now we are being asked, in our public life, to pretend religion doesn't exist, or that it isn't important."

Hasson isn't so much arguing that the elimination of school prayers caused the social corrosion of which he speaks as that the prayer rulings are one element of the general displacement of religion from public affairs.

Isn't it likely that the Washington-based Becket Fund will become the creature either of the Catholic church or the religious right? Hasson doesn't think so. He notes that Jay Byrnes, a practicing Jew, is a director of the fund and that Cardinal O'Connor has joined its advisory board. "And I don't think we'll be handling any creation-ism cases," he adds.

What of the embarrassment-ringing from discomfiture to humiliation—expressed by some minority religiousists at public displays of Christian symbols? Would he, that is to say, defend manger scenes in the courthouse lobby?

"My father is an immigrant from Northern Ireland, where I still have relatives and occasionally visit," he says. "I have no illusions about what it's like to be an oppressed religious minority to somebody else's culture. But these things can be handled, at least in America, with simple good manners and respect. There's nothing inappropriate about people making construction-paper menorahs or manger scenes, as long as the teacher handles it tactfully and with respect."

"What seems clear to me is that in the name of protecting the sensibilities of the religious minorities, we're throwing the baby out with the bath. We've reached the point where everybody's religion is being equally disrespected by the state. I don't think that's a good thing."

The State of the Union Undress

WASHINGTON—All the folderol surrounding State of the Union addresses illustrates the state of the union.

The president—any president—enters the House chamber to ridiculously prolonged applause. The applauders are politicians, whose excessive praise of one another expresses ambivalence about praise: Any but unlimited praise may imply limits to their praise-worthiness. The president is supposed to give "information of the state of the union." Then an opposition leader delivers a televised "response" written days before he has heard what he is responding to.

Interbranch deliberation has long since been displaced by rhetoric designed to produce mass effects. Jeffrey Tulis of the University of Texas, author of "The Rhetorical Presidency," notes that leaders of the two political branches did not always speak past one another to vast amorphous constituencies. During the first two presidencies, those of Washington and Adams, the House and Senate formed committees to draft responses to the president's address. The responses were carried to the president, who responded to the delegations delivering them.

Jefferson ended the practice of delivering the State of the Union message in person to Congress. Henry Adams, in his history of Jefferson's administration, notes that the Jefferson-Madison faction considered the custom of presidents addressing Congress "an English habit" smacking of monarchical grandeur, the lofty instructing the underlings.

When the practice of delivering the State of the Union in person to Congress was revived, in 1913, the reviver was a former professor of political science who had, as professors are apt to have, a theory. Woodrow Wilson believed that the presidency is the only office able to, or even entitled to, impart movement to government. Wilson thought the president must, with his rhetoric, energize the public in order to compel Congress.

Wilson thus rejected the modest notion of the presidency endorsed by the first president and the founding generation. Washington's biographer James Thomas Flexner says Washington "did not visualize the President as an initiator of policy, a prime mover." Washington wrote: "The election of the different branches of Congress by freemen, either directly or indirectly, is the pivot on which turns the first wheel of the government, a wheel which communicates motion to all the rest."

Conservatives, who once believed in congressional supremacy, now accept the Wilsonian model of the presidency, for three reasons. First, it is now conventional, and so are they. Second, Congress is controlled by Democrats. Third, their recent hero, Ronald Wilson Reagan, had the rhetorical skills requisite for a Wilsonian presidency.

Liberals have two reasons for favoring a Wilsonian presidency. The rhetorical presidency is suited to stirring passions, such as fear, which can reconcile the public to expansive government. And such a presidency encourages plebiscitary, non-deliberative government—the framing of public disputes starkly as "us versus them."

Health care reform, the president's probable preoccupation in Tuesday's State of the Union Address, illustrates tendencies of the modern presidency. Reform has been identified with the presidency, with the implication that any reform by Congress less sweeping than the president's will reflect the provincialism of a lesser institution. Furthermore, the drive for vast expansion of government in the name of reform has been fueled by manufactured fear—the declaration that America's health care system is in "crisis." What should be a deliberative process is becoming a cartoon conflict of heroes and villains.

Inflation in the health care sector has been cited by the president as one of the primary justifications for his 1,300-page reform bill. However, that inflation continues to decline, to 6.3 percent in the first half of 1993 and 4.4 in the second half, largely because of reasonable public and private sector responses to market forces.

Yet Vice President Gore, asked whether declining inflation indicates a diminished need for radical surgery on the system, says he sees something sinister:

"Oh, I don't think there's any doubt about what it indicates. It indicates that some of those who were shamelessly exploiting the system got scared to death as health care reform began to be debated and as the administration and allies of ours in the Congress said that they were going to put the spotlight on the worst examples of abuses in the system. And I mean there's a lot of anecdotal evidence of boards of these companies sitting around saying, hey, we better cool it and slow down these cost increases while this battle's going on."

Does any serious person really believe inflation is significantly caused or contained by cabals of villains? Probably not, but such folderol flows from the rhetorical presidency, which will be on display in the house chamber Tuesday night.

June "Rapp" Oravits

If You're an Amoeba, Is It Okay Not to Like You?

Lately, I've been bombarded with the subject of feminism. It's been brought up and bounced around in almost all my classes.

Now, I'm a woman, but I've never really thought about my woman-ness being something to worry about. It's just me, June. That's how I've always operated. I've never considered it to be me—June Woman. If so, I'd have to worry about some Tarzan dude swinging by yelling, "Hey, Babe." (Why I'd ever worry about it anyway is beyond me. Tarzan, wherever you are, pick me...pick me!)

Besides, I'd rather be the one swinging on the vine snatching up some good-looking honey and screaming for joy at the top of my lungs. Does that make me a feminist? Naah, I think it just makes me normal (well, maybe a tad abnormal).

I'm told I'm discriminated against because I'm a woman. Maybe I am. Then again, maybe I'm not. I've tried to think back to jobs I've held, but I've always worked for a female boss, so I can't say I was sexually discriminated against in the work place.

I pay the same tuition as any male counterpart at UNCW. No complaints from me here. The bookstore doesn't collect a little extra fee from me when I purchase textbooks just because I'm a woman (they're very impartial on the price of textbooks—I think they excel at screwing ALL students).

There may be subtle ways in which I'm slighted due to my femaleness. If so, I'm either stupidly numb or the instigator is devilishly clever. I may as well admit—I don't recognize even blatant attempts at discrimination. I just don't think about stuff like this. But, then again, maybe I should.

This was brought home to me in one of my classes (which shall remain unidentified to protect the not-so-innocent). The subject of various approaches of literary criticism was being discussed. Up popped the feminist approach. The instructor read a passage which supposedly outraged feminists. I'm sitting there puzzled, wondering what's the offensive part?

Unfortunately, I'm a prime example of living journalism—every thing I feel or think can be read on my face (not a great attribute if you're asked to participate in a game of dispenze-with-your-clothes poker).

"June, you don't look like you get it," the professor comments. Forty-five people shift in their seats and 90 eyeballs are now eyeing me, as eyeballs tend to do. AAARGH!

"No, I don't," I admit. It's too late to deny it, my loud-mouthed face has already told them.

"Listen carefully," I'm instructed. "Penetrating thrust..." the professor paused expectantly.

Life as an inanimate splinter of wood suddenly seemed attractive to me—anything was preferable to being the ignoble center of this unwanted attention. A wave of heat seared through my body and I was afraid my face would burst into flames. If I was a planet, I'd have gloved a brighter red than Mars. Maybe I should apply for a job as a nightgown at the nuclear plant.

"Yeah, yeah, I get it," I managed to choke out.

The issue here is that I wouldn't have thought the passage she read was offensive unless it had been pointed out to me. The words weren't directly referring to sex; in fact, the passage wasn't even about sex but literature. When I want to talk about sex, I'll come right out and say so. Why beat around the ...oh dear, now I'm doing it.

So now, I worry. Do I denigrate my fellow (oh blast, what word to use here) women in my speech and writing? If so, this must be a fault I need to correct.

It's almost a moot issue, I'm sure to offend someone somewhere at any time: people who wear band-aids on their left big toe, people with blue eyes (I, myself, have green eyes which is best for absolutely nothing), men, Dalmatians who've lost their spots, and others. Can a person actually use language without offending someone or something?

In living, the abstract concepts of loving and hating exist. It's rather pointless to disclaim the presence of either one. But to exist peacefully, maybe we should make concrete applications of those intangibles: you might hate your ex-husband because he's an abusive jerk—but not because he's a man. I love Langston Hughes' poetry because of its musical qualities—not because he's an African-American. In other words, it's not right, in my opinion, to use religion, politics, age, nationality, sex and so on as justification for either loving or hating. For that matter, I really could not care less if your sexual preferences run the way of three-toed sloths. Your tastes may be considered weird, but you're still a person.

If you play nice with me, I'll play nice with you. If you're mean to me, I won't particularly like you for it, but it certainly won't be because you happen to have been born on the planet Saturn and I've suddenly decided all you Ring people are amoebas not worthy of my respect.

Consideration of the feminist viewpoint is of value. So are the viewpoints of men, students, all nationalities and cultural heritages, and even the cardboard box makers of America. We must be sensitive to all these areas and more. But when do we start caring about people for just being people? Are we so into labeling everybody that we've forgotten our common denominator that makes us human?

What else do I need to worry about? Musician-ism? Blue-eyed People-ism? Each -ism we come up with requires other -isms. In my limbo brain, it's like the well-known ripple effect. You toss one little person with a band-aid on their left big toe in the pond and what do you have? You have little soggy band-aids popping up everywhere. It's a no win situation.

I don't know what to do about any of this stuff. It's hard to keep up with it all. I think I'll stick to trying to be considerate and respectful of individual people. I'm not always successful, but I try. It doesn't matter to me what your personal -ism is, I'll care about you.

But if you do something goofy, don't be surprised if I jump on it. I won't promise to be your door-mat, and I'm certainly not going to let you treat me like something you pick up with your pooper-scooper. After all, I'm a "people" too. If you'll forgive me for error I make or dense displays of ignorance as I attempt to traverse the conundrums of discriminatory language, I promise to forgive you for not taking a course in June-ism.

Race Matters

I just finished reading Cornel West's book, "Race Matters" and found it to be a candid description of the problems related to race in our country not only between African-American people and white people but within the African-American community itself. It is truly worthwhile and eye-opening reading and left me reflecting on some insights I gained for myself.

First of all, as West himself says, "We need to begin with a frank acknowledgment of the basic humaneness and Americanness of each of us. And we must acknowledge that as the people we are only a slippery slope toward economic strife, social turmoil, and cultural chaos. If we go down, we go down together." I feel strongly that this is an accurate perception and should become a clear source of motivation for we of the white majority taking the issue of racism very seriously. We are all in this together and the increasing economic and social problems of all minorities illustrated in the reality of increased violence, should indicate to all of us the threat inherent in the unjust realities of our society. If justice is not enough of a motivation to cause many to work to address the real problems of minority people, then our own survival should serve to enhance motivation to address the issues that will impact us all.

A second insight that emerged for me was that the issue should no longer be focused around segregation but increasingly on equal opportunity for all people. Integration in no way guarantees access to power and justice. The goal should not be to incorporate minorities into a majority culture but to provide freedom of access in real ways so that people, whatever their background, can choose to live out their dreams without unfair blockage. Equal opportunity does mean that we have to redress past injustices. Minorities in inner cities are in such a deep hole that the issue is too often survival rather than freedom for personal development. West describes a kind of hopeless nihilism within the African-American community and states, "Nihilism is not overcome by argument or analyses; it is attained by love and care. Any disease of the soul must be conquered by the turning of one's soul. This turning is done through one's own affirmation of one's worth—an affirmation fueled by the concern for others. A love ethic must be at the center of politics of conversion." The challenge for white and African-American Americans and all minorities is great.

In last week's issue, the text that appeared under Bob Haywood's column was actually that of George Will. This is the article that should have appeared. We apologize.

The third and final insight for me spins off of the second. Besides equal opportunity, we need to strive to encourage the appreciation of diversity as one of the hallmarks of our American society. We used to take pride in seeing our nation as a "melting pot" of different cultures. Assimilation through integration is not a valid goal. Allowing conditions to exist where people can be who they are as informed by their cultural heritage is a much more positive and exciting avenue to pursue. I love New York and part of the richness of that city is to walk through the side to side neighborhoods of Little Italy and China Town, each so very different, each affirming the heritage of those who make it up, and each contributing a panel of rich color to the crazy quilt that is New York City. West has helped me realize what a sick pressure there is upon the African-American community to be "like white people." What a difference it would have made if African culture had been able to move to America of their own free-will to establish their own communities with their own heritage and thus fold over into American culture out of that rich foundation. Their journey through slavery has done immeasurable damage not only to African-American self-image but also the image of African-Americans in the minds of the white majority.

Here at the University we have the rich opportunity to raise consciousness of these incredible important issues in our life and to develop new insights through new experiences that will help to create an environment more just and equal and exciting as well.

A Touch of Class

By Sam Cuthrell
Entertainment Writer

Somebody important once said, "The key to life is to experience as much of it as possible." Not being one to ignore good advice, I decided to broaden my musical horizons one step at a time. For starters, I went to the Icehouse last Saturday, to catch a few sets of the Brad Davis Quartet.

I'll be the first to admit that I know absolutely nothing about jazz, but I was still impressed by this ensemble. The lineup featured Brad Davis on saxophone, Andy Page on electric guitar, Zack Page on standup and electric bass, and Rob Murphree on drums.

Being a long-time friend of Zack and Andy, I wasn't quite sure what type of music to expect. After living with them on campus last year, I know firsthand the type of heavy-metal mayhem that the two are capable of. (I think they are the long-lost members of Biohazard.) However, after grabbing a beer and a chair (I've never seen chairs in a club before), the music of Brad Davis Quartet began to flow in ways I had never expected.

Brad Davis' sax was low and mellow, Andy's guitar was impeccable (as always), Zack's fingers were nothing but a blur on the standup bass, and Rob provided a steady rhythm for the entire thing.

I had the chance to talk to Zack to get a little background on the quartet, which has only played publicly twice, including Saturday night.

The Brad Davis Quartet's music is closely related to funky-style jazz, which was popular during the mid-to-late sixties. They play renditions of tunes by Horace Silver, Stanley Turrentine, and Herbie Hancock, along with the more well-known artists, such as Miles Davis.

Many people get frustrated with jazz because of the extremely long solos, which characterizes many jazz ensembles. This quartet, however, keeps its solos down to a minimum, and also plays five to six short songs per set, instead of three of four long ones. This continual progression helps to keep the music more interesting than many more traditional jazz groups.

An evening at the Icehouse was definitely a new experience for me, and although I did miss a few of my usual weekend pastimes, (there was no mosh pit, for instance), it was an evening of incredible music.

One last note: for all you slam-happy hardcore, Onyx will be at the Mad Monk on Saturday the 29th. Don't screw up by waiting to buy your ticket. Assuming that I survive, (and that I'll be able to type), there should be a write-up in next week's edition of The Seahawk.

The Palomino Revisited!

By D. Neal Leeper
Entertainment Editor

People come up to me all the time and say "Neal, that was a great article on New Orleans!" or "Gee, Neal, that article on New Orleans really sucked. Who cares about what you do on vacations." I hear all kinds of things about my page. Of all the articles written this year, everyone has had something positive to say about The Palomino Club review. I hear everything ranging from "Neal, you were right—that place is fun!" or "I liked the article on The Palomino, I think I'll go out there and try it out." Whatever people say, I firmly believe that my article in The Seahawk was a spark that has led to the Wednesday phenomenon at The Palomino.

Maybe the fire that was created is running out of control.

When I first wrote the article, the Wednesday night crowd wasn't that large. I enjoyed my experience at the club and was eager to tell everyone about it. As time went on and the new semester began, the crowds became larger and larger. You see, the Wednesday night admission is $1.00 for members and guests. Drink specials include $1.00 long-necked beers. The combination of the drink specials and social interaction created an "unofficial" college night at The Palomino.

With drink specials and college students, one thing is for sure, people are going to get drunk. And when people get drunk, they begin to do stupid things.

At all country dance clubs, there is something known as dance floor etiquette. This is a quick rundown:

- 1) The inner dance floor is reserved for line dances
- 2) The outer rim of the inner dance floor is for two-stepping or partner dances
- 3) The outer "corral" is for two-steppers or other partner dances.
- 4) AT NO TIME ARE STANDING, CIGARETTES, OR DRINKS ALLOWED ON THE DANCE FLOOR.

There are reasons for these rules. Of course, they are designed for the safety of the clientele. Personally, I find the last rule the most important and, ironically, the most abused.

If you drink or smoke while dancing, odds are, you'll drop ashes or liquid on the floor. The floor is made of wood and is specifically designed for those of us who wear boots. If stuff gets on the floor, it ruins the floor and could ruin someone's footwear. And, for those of you who aren't in tune to boot prices, they range anywhere from $69.99 to over $500.00. And I bet you anything that there are a few people out there that would get VERY upset if you ruined their snakeskin boots while acting like an idiot on the dance floor.

For those that go line dancing on a regular basis, the names "Funky Cowboy", "Sixteen Step", "Reggae Cowboy", "West Coast Shuffle", "Electra Two", and "Arkansas Stomp" mean something. For those that get wasted at The Palomino and attend on Wednesday nights only, they probably mean nothing. You see, it has been my observation over the last couple weeks that many people are treating the club similar to that of The New Zoo on college night. The mentality has been to go to The Palomino, get drunk, and dance. Folks, you can't do that at this club.

Line dances are practiced, learned, and rehearsed for public exhibition. In other words, you have to learn the dance in order to do it. It's not like a typical top 40 club where you can get on the dance floor and jump around and gyrate all over the place. For some unknown reason, many people do not understand this fact and continue to treat it just like that. There are a lot of folks out there that are getting "hammered," stumbling on the dance floor, attempting to do some sort of movement, and then getting another beer. When they are on the floor, they spend most of their time bumping into others and kicking people off. Don't get me wrong, I know there are people out there that are trying to learn some of these dances and that's fine. If you want to learn, make the attempt to learn. Trust me, you won't be able to pick up any of these dances up if you drink continuously and get intoxicated. It's like studying for a test after finishing that twelve-pack. You probably won't be able to recall much of the knowledge acquired during your intoxicated state.

Learning to line dance is along the same lines. If you have been drinking heavily, don't try to learn any of the dances. Stand at the bar or go ride the bull. Let those of us that enjoy line dancing DANCE. It's only fair.

Other than the individuals that act like blundering idiots at The Palomino, the place has taken off tremendously. Remember, if you want to get a membership, there is a fee of $3.00 to pay with a three day waiting period. Dance lessons are on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Sunday nights. Two-step lessons begin at 7:30 and line dance lessons start around 8:20 or so. These lessons are free and are conducted by the very sexy Bobb McCullen.

Women Taking Steps In UNC System

BY MARNEE ELDREDGE

Seabawk Reporter

Being a woman of the nineties, I have recently become very disturbed by an article in The Charlotte Observer regarding women, or lack thereof, in the UNC system. The article stated that of 16 chancellors in the university system, all are men. Though I don't consider myself a mewing feminist, I often question just how liberated women have become. It was my understanding that women became liberated in the sixties. I thought that the author/poet Adrienne Rich made it crystal clear in her 1977 speech to the graduating class of Douglass College, that women were to stand up and "claim an education," they were to respect themselves as equals, and demand that they be treated as such. Was I wrong? One member of the North Carolina Board of Governors agrees with me, in that it could be possible that women are not claiming what they could be. According to The Charlotte Observer, Mr. Spangler, UNC systems President, gave the board a tongue-lashing for the fact that nothing has been done about the lack of women candidates for school chancellor, nor the absence of female provosts (an administrative official dealing chiefly with faculty and curriculum, etc.) Though it may be considered comparing apples to oranges, I was inspired to accumulate a few numbers regarding men and women in our teaching administration. Thanks to Ms. Nancy Hill of Institutional Research, where such numbers are tabulated and kept, I found what I was looking for.

In the fall of 1993, it was tabulated that out of 426 teaching positions here at UNCW, 160 were held by women and the other 266 by men, this averages out to be 62 percent male and 38 percent female.

According to a survey of administrators in the university system, as a whole in 1992 women made up only 17.9 percent of the department chairmen, a mere 30.5 percent of associate and assistant vice chancellors, 23.6 percent of deans and a tiny 10 percent of vice-chancellors and provosts. The question then becomes: Are we lacking women fit for the positions available, or does gender still play a larger role in society than we choose to admit? Referring again to The Charlotte Observer, the committees, which are formed to gather applicant pools for any available chancellor position, have, for the last eight years, recommended only men. Though women have complained for years that they are prevented from moving up in the university system, the Board of Governors counteracts this argument with the plain and simple fact that women are still small in numbers as compared to men in administrative positions. Once again, I am forced to believe that women are not losing the opportunity due to gender, but due to number. Not enough women are claiming the stance needed for such a position. In no way do I want to see the position "handed over" to a woman merely to avoid a sexual discrimination confrontation if the job were denied her, but I want to see many women competing for the promotion because they are over-qualified and deserve the position fair and square. However, whatever the case may be, we can rest assured knowing UNCW itself has many high positioned women, such as our Dean of Students Pat Leonard and our Assistant Vice Chancellor Jo Ann Seiple.

Fly Wright! The Story of Two Brothers

The UNCW University Theatre production of Fly Wright! The Story of Two Brothers has advanced to the Southeastern regional level of the Kennedy Center American College Theatre Festival, one of only two North Carolina universities to advance to this level. The UNCW production will be one of six shows presented at Clemson University from Feb. 1-6, 1994. Fly Wright! will be staged at 8:30 p.m. Saturday, February 5. From among eight such regional competitions, six productions will be selected from 50 plays to go to the Kennedy Center for the noncompetitive national festival.

Gerasimov Promotes Understanding At UNCW

BY FIONA RICE

Seabawk Reporter

The people in Russia are discouraged by the reform there because they are not living in the land of milk and honey like they expected, said Ambassador Gennadi Gerasimov in his press briefing Jan. 18 held at UNCW.

The people used to have money but no goods, he said, and now they have no money but plenty of goods. President Boris Yeltsin has made communism look good in the eyes of the people and they now look at their communist past as the "good old days," Gerasimov said.

The people in villages are more self-supporting, so it is not as rough for them, Gerasimov said; but city people are now living on fixed incomes and cannot afford much.

As a result of their economic problems, Gerasimov said Yeltsin is now blamed for the suffering and therefore disliked by his own people. He said Yeltsin has no charisma and speaks in economic terms; therefore, the people do not understand him. Since the switch from communism takes time, the Russian people will not see the fruits of their labor, he said, but their children will.

Gerasimov commented on former President Mikhail Gorbachev and his future in Russia. Gorbachev currently has a speaking career and charges up to $5,000 a plate. He is head of the Gorbachev Foundation and has an office in the Presidio, a former military base overlooking the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco. Although Gorbachev is popular abroad, Gerasimov said, he has no political future in Russia and his political friends hold different positions and are no longer powerful.

Glasnost lifted the restrictions on journalists in Russia and there has been an explosion of publications and in-depth articles, Gerasimov said, including a Russian Penthouse. Before the reform, journalists knew what they could and could not print and were subsidized by the government. He said he thinks Russians are heading towards freedom of the press.

Gerasimov is former editor-in-chief of the Moscow News, a paper that has a circulation of one million and is printed in five different languages. He said the newspaper was profitable although it had no advertising because of the government subsidization. Now, publications are in economic trouble because they are no longer subsidized.

When asked about President Clinton's ability to deal with foreign relations, Gerasimov said he had no criticism. He said Clinton is supporting democracy in Russia and has supported Yeltsin as well. However, Gerasimov said, Clinton is starting to distance himself slightly from Yeltsin.

Gerasimov received an invitation to teach at UNCW for the spring semester and is teaching "Developments in Politics and Communications in Russia and the Soviet Union." He would like to use his time here to promote better understanding between the people of the U.S. and Russia.

Drugs

students about things he did to support his addiction and the remorse and shame he feels.

Campus Police also offers two DWI programs. One is centered around the experiences of a highway patrolman. He tells students about countless accidents that involved drunk drivers. Another program involves a woman's experience of how her brother, a college freshman, was hit and killed by a drunk driver.

These programs focus on innocent victims and unfortunate consequences of alcohol and other drug abuse. All of these incidents could have been prevented. The harsh reality is that students abuse drugs anyway. Even though students face the campus and criminal judicial systems, many are indifferent towards getting caught.

"We hope our programs have a deterring effect. I would like to think that all of our crime prevention efforts are not done in vain," said Thomas.

SGA PLANS

BY DONNA ALPHIN

Seabawk Reporter

Topping SGA's list are plans to erect a memorial foundation and free speech monument. President Ziggy Nix said at a Student Affairs Committee meeting earlier this month. The foundation, currently being developed, would serve as a central area in which to pay homage to deceased faculty members and students via candlelight services.

Nix hopes to complete the free speech monument by early March. It will be a place where students can go to speak their minds. Nix envisions the monument as a plaque placed on a large granite rock and located adjacent to Randall Library.

SGA is also looking into building information kiosks and porch swings around campus, and installing courtesy phones in Trask Coliseum, Randall Library and Cameron and Wagoner halls. Other projects include a student action team designed to increase professionalism in campus stores.

Research Fellowship Awards

The Research Committee will be reviewing applications for Undergraduate Research Fellowships available for the 1994-95 academic year. Fellowship awards consist of a partial tuition waiver in the amount of $1000. This competition, intended to stimulate original research among undergraduate students, is open to any rising junior or senior who has completed at least one semester at UNCW.

A proposed research project may be in any academic area and should be completed by the end of the 1994-95 academic year. Each student must have a faculty sponsor who serves as an advisor and assists in selecting a project suitable to the student's abilities and the timing of the awards. The project idea may originate with the student or advisor but must be developed to a substantial degree by the student. Course credit may be arranged through a Directed Individual Study or the Honors Program. If no credit is obtained, the final product must be submitted to the Research Committee Chair by the last class day of the Spring 1995 semester. Acceptance of the award of a tuition waiver may affect other financial aid eligibility.

Each application must include a complete student information sheet, 15 copies of the proposal, two faculty evaluations of the student's potential, and a copy of the student's transcript. If the proposed research involved human or animal subjects, approval must be obtained through appropriate ethics review procedures prior to submission. Photocopies of approval documents must be submitted with the proposal. Information packets and application forms will be available after January 24th from Ms. Kathy Dorney, Room 141 Friday Hall.

Candidates must file their application with their respective department chairperson no later than MARCH 15, 1994. Each department chair should review the completed application and sign the information sheet indicating the availability of departmental resources for the project. Candidates should then deliver their application package to Room 141 Friday Hall by 9:00 a.m., March 31 and register for an interview with the Faculty Research Committee.

For further information please contact Dr. Richard M. Dillaman, Research Committee Chair, Department of Biology and Center for Marine Science Research, 256-3721.

Dear University Community:

It is appropriate that during Resident Assistant Appreciation Week that the University Community acknowledges the contributions of those individuals that offer their services to others as RAs. These people give freely of their time and energy so that others may be able to experience collegiate life more fully.

It is no small task for a student to balance their academic work load and the Resident Assistant position. On occasion, these individuals stay up until dawn to help resolve personal crises. These individuals work to maintain order within the halls so that other students may pursue their dreams.

I want to take this time during RA Appreciation Week to say thank you. Speaking on the behalf of the entire university community, I want to recognize the following Resident Assistant staff:

Basketball Teams Back at Home

Men's Basketball

Coach Kevin Eastman's club continues to enjoy balanced scoring in 1993-94, featuring four starters in double figures and five players averaging eight points or better. UNCW's leading point producers are Chris Meighen (15.2 ppg), Corey Stewart (12.2 ppg), Sherif El-Saadany (10.7 ppg) and Darren Moore (10.6 ppg).

UNCW has developed into one of the top defensive clubs in the conference, holding opponents to 43.6 per cent shooting from the floor and 69.7 ppg. JMU's 85-point effort on Saturday was the second highest total for an opponent this season.

The Seahawks have 11 games remaining in the regular season, seven at home and four on the road. Following Wednesday's contest with the Spiders, UNCW travels to Greenville, N.C. this weekend for a 4:00 p.m. televised game with East Carolina at Minges Coliseum.

Women's Basketball

Coach Susan Yow's Seahawks women are back at home for a pair of Colonial Athletic Association matchups following a three-game road swing that saw UNCW lose two-of-three games.

UNCW plays host to James Madison on Friday (Jan. 28) at 7:30 p.m. before entertaining Richmond on Sunday at 2 p.m.

The Seahawks women played their best game of the year in an 86-68 victory at Coastal Carolina last Wednesday before being plagued by turnovers and poor shooting over the weekend resulting in losses at Old Dominion (66-40) and William and Mary (67-48).

Myra Horton punched in a career-high 25 points and UNCW shot a season-high 59 per cent from the field in the rout at Coastal. Horton led a season-best five Seahawk players in double figures as UNCW turned a 34-all half-time deadlock into an 18-point victory on the road.

Against the Monarchs on Friday, UNCW committed 16 of its season-high 28 turnovers in the first half en route to a 36-18 half-time deficit. Two-time CAA Player-of-the-Year Celeste Hill led three Monarch players in double figures with 13 points and 12 rebounds to lead ODU, which was held to 40 per cent shooting from the field.

Myra Horton scored a team-high 13 points and Hannah Grady contributes 11 points and seven rebounds for UNCW, which was outrebounded, 40-29.

The Seahawk women come out strong at William and Mary on Saturday, leading the Tribe, 13-10, midway through the first half. But William and Mary closed out the half on a 20-6 run, taking a 30-19 lead at the break. The Tribe started the second half right where it left off, opening with a 20-4 surge to put the game out of reach.

Marlin Gayton led the Tribe with 17 points and a career-high 18 rebounds. Kelly Norton and Amber Blank led UNCW with eight points each, while Hannah Grady registered six points and 11 rebounds.

Through 14 games, Horton leads UNCW in scoring (137 ppg), field goal percentage (.513), steals (24) and blocks (6). Horton who has registered four games of 20 or more points, has paced UNCW in scoring in five of the last six outings.

THEY SAID IT....

"Some people try to find things in this game that don't exist. Football is two things. It's blocking and tackling."

Swimmers Rebound at Davidson

Next Meet
Jan. 29

BY SHANNON MCBRIDE
Sports Writer

The UNCW men's and women's swimming teams defeated Davidson and Georgia Southern in a dual meet last Saturday. The men's record is now 7-2 overall and 3-1 in the conference, and the women's record has moved to 6-3 overall and 3-1 in the CAA.

Two school records were set by brothers Burak and Murat Erdem. Burak won the 200 Backstroke (1:52.61) and Murat took the 200 Butterfly (1:56.14).

Robert Dermer also had a good meet, winning both the 200 Individual Medley (1:58.42) and the 100 Freestyle (48.56). The men beat Davidson, 128-95, and Georgia Southern, 127-79.

On the women's side, Karla Zick was, again, a standout, winning three events. Zick swept the 200 Individual Medley (2:15.00), 500 Freestyle (5:14.37), and 200 Breaststroke (2:27.03) - helping the women to beat Davidson, 131-88, and Georgia Southern, 146-96.

Diver Kelli Sutton was also a double winner for the Lady Seahawks, taking both the One-Meter (213.60) and Three-Meter (221.45) diving events.

Coach Allen was extremely pleased with the outcome of the meet and looks forward to the end of the season, and to the CAA Conference meet February 16-19 in Greensville, N.C.

This Saturday the Seahawks will host their final home meet against East Carolina at 2 p.m. in the Natatorium.

Karate Club

BY BARRY WOOD

Have you ever been interested in Karate? Do you want to know more about it? Well, now students and faculty at UNCW have the chance. A new karate club has recently begun on campus and we are looking for new members. With the cooperation of Sensei John Maizenholder and Sensei Greg Noland it has been made not only possible to offer experienced students the chance to work out, but also inexperienced students a chance to learn. We are now in the midst of getting the club chartered as a karate school and registering with the National Karate Association.

What will be taught is not sport karate, it is the art of life protection. This could be of particular interest to the women on campus. Karate can not only teach you to protect yourself adequately, but it will give you the confidence that you can keep yourself safe and alive. There are other values of karate that will be instilled on the serious student and anyone with further questions can contact the president of the club, Barry Wood, at 350-5610.

Equality In Sports?

BY FRANK R. SODA

My purpose in writing is to obtain public support for holding the Congress and Administration responsible for failing to enforce Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 concerning women's participation in intercollegiate athletics.

On April 9, 1992, Chairwoman Cardiss Collins of the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer Protection and Competitive Issues opened hearings on: "Title IX: The effects of Women's Sports and Gender Equity". Copies of the witness list for this hearing and all documents cited herein are available at your newspaper office for public review or copying. In this hearing, Mr. Schultz, executive director, National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) discussed the efforts of the NCAA to assist its members in achieving gender equity in intercollegiate athletics.

In my opinion, because the NCAA sponsors twice as many male teams in its basketball and lacrosse Division I championship tournaments as female teams and no comparable female team to the large male football teams in these championship tournaments, it is extremely unlikely that the NCAA will be considered a serious factor in the promotion of gender equity among its members.

In testimony at these hearings, Ms. Vargyas, Senior Counsel for Education and Employment, National Women's Law Center, states that the underlying cause for inequities in the treatment of women in competitive athletics is "a failure of leadership" both the university community and government enforcement agencies to address the problem" (see page 2). She reviewed the Brooklyn College case which was resolved by the Office For Civil Rights (OCR), U.S. Department of Education, as an example of this failed government enforcement. In this case, several dates by which time the College has committed to take certain action had elapsed without such action having been taken. However, OCR closed this case finding no violation based on assurances given by this institution under investigation. There was no enforcement of those violated assurances. To reinforce this assertion by Ms. Vargyas, I am enclosing the by Towson State University (TSU) and the first evaluation by OCR under these assurances of April 9, 1992. This evaluation shows that in at least 2 of 5 areas, TSU failed to meet its assurances in recruitment and support services. Moreover, OCR found that a new area, athletic financial aid, which was adequate in its 1989-90 academic year review had deteriorated dramatically in the 1990-91 academic year. No OCR enforcement action is discussed or threatened in this evaluation for TSU's failure to comply completely with its assurances to the OCR.

Although Ms. Vargyas suggested to this Subcommittee that the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, The Honorable Michael L. Williams, be subpoenaed to appear before this Subcommittee hearing: he was informed that he would appear at another meeting of this Subcommittee. However, I was informed in September, 1992, by a subcommittee staff member that due to insufficient time no more hearings on this matter will be held by this Subcommittee in the one hundred and second Congress.

If sufficient time is unavailable for enforcement of Title IX by either the Administration or the 102nd Congress; then, the public must demand an explanation from their Senators and Representatives to justify such an extreme delay in view of the enactment of Title IX twenty years ago. In order to assist the public in this effort, I am enclosing the Washington, D.C. addresses and the district telephone numbers of all these House Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer Protection, and Competitive Issues members. In addition to obtaining the positions of candidates for national office, the public is strongly urged to make it clear that any incumbent who thought that after 20 years Title IX should wait more before it is seriously enforced in competitive athletics, will wait more than 20 years to obtain their vote at election.

If someone desires to discuss these matters further or to obtain additional information, they may contact me at telephone (410) 455-9687.

Shannon McBride is a senior swimmer on this years UNCW Women's Swimming team, competing in the 100 m and 200 m backstroke and 100 m butterfly. She will graduate in May with a degree in English.

Shannon started swimming in her hometown of Wilmington, Delaware with her friends, who thought it was "fun." Shannon didn't think too much of swimming at first and called her dad crying: "come pick her up five minutes after he dropped her off!" "My dad finally told me to make a decision, and I started to get better so I stayed with it," commented Shannon. In seventh grade, Shannon started swimming on a summer league and by the end of the summer she enjoyed swimming more and began to swim year round for the eighth grade.

Shannon chose to attend UNCW mainly for its Marine Biology program. Her choices were between Florida State and UNCW for a swimming scholarship. "I liked the coach and the people I met on my recruiting trip," stated Shannon about her reasons for choosing UNCW. (Shannon switched majors in her sophomore year.)

Shannon feels the swim team has gotten stronger and more talented over her four years at UNCW. She believes the men's team should perform well at the Eastern and the conference meets this year. She adds, "They have a lot of talent and depth." Shannon hopes the women's team will also do well at the conference meet, despite the numerous injuries on the team. "Hopefully in February when conference is, we should be up to par," comments Shannon about the women's team.

Shannon is looking forward to the conference meet and to get her time down to a competitive level to place in the finals, regardless of her recent shoulder surgery. Shannon swam her first meet this season two weeks ago. She had arthroscopic surgery on her shoulder in November. Shannon didn't think she would even be able to swim at all her final season, but she healed faster than her doctor or she ever imagined. Shannon comments on her struggle to come back as a top performer by saying: "Intellectually I know I am not going to perform at the same level I was before surgery, but it is still emotionally hard because I still have high expectations of myself." Shannon hopes she can help the team point-wise, heading towards the conclusion of this season.

After graduation, Shannon will continue to swim recreationally and participate in triathlons. She has also applied to graduate school for a MFA (Masters of Fine Arts) in Creative Writing. Then Shannon would like to go to Law School to Study Environmental Law. Ultimately, no matter what Shannon decides to pursue as a career, she would "really like to continue to write because that is what I love to do."

Shannon has had a lot of support throughout her career at UNCW. Her coach has been very supportive of her even through the trouble with her shoulder. Her roommates have helped her out a lot. "They listen to me complain even though they aren't swimmers and encourage me when I feel down about the sport," comments Shannon. She also gives much credit to her Creative Writing professors, Phillip Girard and Kathleen Halse. Says Shannon, "They took my work seriously and pushed me to a new level and made me want to pursue this field." Through Shannon's college years, her parents have been "amazing" between all the time spent taking me to and from practice. "They pushed me when I knew I wanted to be pushed but never forced any issues," replies Shannon about her parental support.

Shannon believes she benefited from being on an athletic team, because it forced her to become independent and responsible. "It helped me to budget my time. If I can't perform well in school, I can't perform well in the pool, which my coach stresses," states Shannon. Shannon feels her friends on the team are a close group of people that practice and help out by cheering.

Shannon was voted Most Improved Swimmer last year and is on the staff of the Seahawk and the Atlants.

Shannon sums up her experience at UNCW by saying "I wouldn't trade it for anything."

News Briefs

ANN ARBOR, MI. — According to a study conducted at the University of Michigan, cigarette and drug use is on the upswing among teenagers. Of 50,000 10th, 11th and 12th grade students at more than 400 schools nationwide, researchers found a two to four percent increase in marijuana use. Cigarette smoking jumped between one and two percent. Researchers also found an increase in the use of LSD and inhalants such as glue.

WASHINGTON — President Clinton urged more than 100 mayors who met with him on Friday to help lobby for anti-crime legislation. Crime bills are pending in the Senate and House. The Senate crime bill would ban classes of semi-automatic weapons, reduce appeals available to convicted felons and add 500 federal crimes to the list of those carrying the death penalty. The House passed several separate bills for drug treatment and prison and domestic violence.

WASHINGTON — A report released by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services estimated that 2.3 million jobs would be needed to get welfare recipients off the rolls. The estimate, three to four times that originally projected, approaches the 3.3 million jobs created by the Works Progress Administration during the Great Depression.

RALEIGH — Legislators say they will support Gov. Jim Hunt's crime package in a special session, but will make changes to improve the bill. Debate in legislative committees could yield better measures than the $120 million package proposed by Hunt. One bill would make it a felony to carry firearms on school property. Another provision would hold parents liable if their children took weapons to school and injured someone. The session begins Feb. 8.

CHAPEL HILL — Paul Hardin said Friday that he will retire as chancellor of UNC-Chapel Hill in 1995. His announcement came at a university board of trustees meeting where 24-hour dormitory visitation rights were approved. Hardin will step down in June 1995, at the end of the university's bicentennial fundraising campaign.

DURHAM — Black leaders have asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the case of a Durham homeowner who shot and killed 15-year-old Jamal Elliott. Michael Seagraves said he shot at Elliott and several other youths after they broke into his garage. Prosecutors said evidence indicated Seagraves fired as the teens were trying to flee. Representatives of the Durham Committee on the Affairs of Black People, the local chapter of the NAACP and the International Ministerial Alliance said prosecutors had poorly handled the case. Seagraves' trial ended in a hung jury Dec. 16, with jurors deadlocked 8-4 in favor of acquittal. A spokesperson said the Justice Department will respond in the next several weeks.

Let Your Fingers Do The Walking

BY JUNE ORAVITS

Imagine tanning on a beach in Cancun, sipping an icy drink, and registering for college classes on a cordless telephone.

Students at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington will soon be able to register for classes by phone from anywhere in the world, according to Ronald E. Whittaker, Registrar for UNCW. This would relieve the frustration of standing for hours in long lines.

"That'll be great," sophomore Erik Totten said. "My friends that go to State, it's so easy for them."

Whittaker hopes to run a controlled test of the phone registration system in April. The test will include undergraduate and graduate students, transfer students and incoming freshmen in order to check the accuracy of the new system, Whittaker said. The control group has not been selected at this time.

To register by phone, a student will dial directly into a mainframe computer using their social security number, personal access code and registration number, Bonnie Howard, Assistant Registrar, said. Whittaker says each student will receive their personal access code and registration number during the pre-advising process, along with written instructions to guide them step-by-step through the phone registration process.

At first, the new system will allow students to register, access grades, check tuition billing and financial aid, Whittaker said. He adds that other options are being considered, such as drop/add, course availability, and paying for tuition and parking tickets by credit card.

"We are going to be much more comprehensive than anyone in the state," Whittaker says.

Whittaker could not say exactly when the phone system will be fully functional. After testing the system, Whittaker says the administration will have a better idea how it is working.

LOWELL Week to Replace National Condom Week

By Erica Brandon
Seahawk Reporter

One out of 500 U.S. college students are infected with the HIV virus. In some places as many as one out of 100 are infected.

Dr. Kathleen Jewell, director of Student Health and Wellness, concluded that good decision-making and avoiding alcohol and drug use will help cut down the risk of contracting AIDS.

Many programs at UNCW promote safe sex. These programs are sponsored by the Livewell Center for Health Promotion.

The programs provide information for all UNC freshmen about STD & AIDS prevention. The Center also recognizes AIDS Awareness month each October. Free condoms are also available in front of the Livewell office at Westside Hall.

Livewell is sponsoring Lowell Week from February 14-18. It will replace National Condom Week. Lowell Week's goal is to have intimacy without sexuality.

Harkening Back To The Jim Crow Era

By KRISTI BROWN
Seahawk Reporter

Construction is projected to begin sometime this spring or summer on a black cultural center.

The center, designed to highlight African-American culture, comes in the wake of controversy over a similar center at UNC-Chapel Hill. The debate ensued when UNC-Chapel Hill students demanded a free-standing building. Chancellor Paul Hardin offered to build the center adjacent to the historic Bell Tower but students protested the proposal, saying it harkened back to the Jim Crow era. Hardin finally consented to build the center adjacent to Wilson Library, a mere 30-second walk from the Bell Tower, in mid-1993.

Ralph Parker, director of Minority Affairs, said, "At this stage, I don't anticipate the same problem occurring here." Parker and several students recently visited the center at Chapel Hill. He said the physical set-up was too small to accommodate a campus that large.

A committee is currently developing UNCW's cultural center but hasn't devised a budget or physical plan. The committee will examine costs of renovation, equipment and furnishings.

"The cultural center will provide sort of a comfort zone," Dean of Students Patricia Leonard said. Leonard said that though the center will be aimed primarily at African-American culture, it will incorporate other cultures in the long term.

The center will be housed in the TV lounge in University Union. The TV will be moved either to the Union living room or the University Center. The center will be completed by fall 1994.

FLY WRIGHT! Advances to Regional Level at Festival

The UNCW University Theatre production of Fly Wright! The Story of Two Brothers has advanced to the regional level of the Kennedy Center American College Theatre Festival (KCACTF). The original opera composed and directed by Frank Trimble, Associate Professor of Communications Studies at UNCW, and produced by the UNCW University Theatre in the Department of Fine Arts, was one of two productions to win the North Carolina ACTF state competition held at Catawba College in November. Set and Light Design was created by Associate Professor, Tom Macie. Costumes were designed by UNCW senior theatre major, Georgia Richardson, under the supervision of Assistant Professor, Toni Bratton.

Politically Incorrect

By TREY CHEEK
Seahawk Reporter

It seems that more and more people are saying certain things in certain ways to be "politically correct."

Personnel managers are now referred to as human resources directors. It is incorrect to call someone a chairman. This person should be called a chairperson. Even a gingerbread man is now called a gingerbread person.

Of course, this helps set things as equal and more clearly defines societal jobs and roles.

However, political correctness can spill over into campus life and create effects that warrant further review.

UNCW Political Science professor Dr. Raymond H. Dawson said real harm can be done on campus when a situation occurs causing members of the community to be singled out.

"The First Amendment tells us that people are free to speak," said Dawson.

Dawson says political correctness begins when attempts are made not to offend someone. Then it may go to the extreme. Political correctness enters when speech is not simply regulated, but tailored a certain way.

The First Amendment gives the right to free speech with little exception. Dawson said it is important to allow people with opinions on both sides of an issue to speak. He also said just because a person is given the right to speak does not mean anyone has to listen.

Thirty years ago, the N.C. State Legislature passed the Speaker Ban Law prohibiting any communist from speaking on a college campus. At the time, speakers within these qualifications wanted to speak at UNC-Chapel Hill. To get around the law, he stood and spoke from a spot a few feet from the campus border. Because of uproar about the law, thousands came to hear him speak.

Political correctness is supposed to avoid offending people. But, like the UNC-Chapel Hill situation, may create more problems than it solves.

UNCW's Graduate Dean Returns to Classroom

UNIVERSITY NEWS BUREAU

UNC Wilmington Provost Dr. Marvin K. Moss today announced that Dr. Eric G. Bolen, dean of the graduate school, has tendered his resignation effective July 1, 1994. Bolen, whose scholarly specialty is wildlife ecology, with emphasis on the conservation and management of natural resources, plans to remain at UNCW and return to full-time teaching in the Department of Biological Sciences.

"UNCW is deeply indebted to Dean Bolen for his dedication in shaping a graduate education program that meets the needs and interests of the Southeast region and that is establishing a national reputation for excellence," said Moss. "He has helped UNCW to fulfill a very important part of its mission, and I know that his graduate faculty and students will miss his wise leadership."

Following a national search, Bolen came to UNC Wilmington in 1988 as the first dean of the graduate school which was officially established in November 1987. During his tenure, graduate program offerings increased from four to 11 master's programs and added a cooperative doctoral program in marine science with N.C. State University. A 12th program, the master of arts in psychology, will be offered beginning fall 1994. Three additional master's programs are pending approval of the UNC Board of Governors: master of fine arts in creative writing, master of liberal arts, and master of accountancy. "Although I have, by choice, maintained classroom contact with students throughout my administrative career, I now plan to increase my level of involvement with teaching, including the initiation of a new course or two," Bolen commented.

Five UNCW students were nominated for the prestigious Irene Ryan Regional Acting Competition. This is funded by a bequest from the estate of the actress, Irene Ryan, best known for her role as "Granny" in the long running TV series, The Beverly Hillbillies. Two candidates from this competition will be sent on to the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C. for the national finals. The Ryan nominees from UNCW are Jennifer Joyner, Aimee Schooley, Karla Stith, Jebediah Toms, and Jason Yates. They will each be required to present a scene study and a monologue at the regional festival. Winners at the regionals receive a $500 scholarship, and those who succeed in the national competition at Kennedy Center receive a $3000 scholarship.

As a member of the Kennedy Center American College Theatre Region IV Festival, UNCW won in the North Carolina state competition, and will advance to the regional festival. This year 45 colleges and universities from 10 southeastern states competed in Region IV. The production will be one of six features in the regional ACTF competition to be held at Clemson University from February 1-6. If successful, Fly Wright! will be showcased at Kennedy Center in Washington D.C. with other winners from across the nation.

Depending on departmental needs, he hopes to develop and teach classes in conservation biology, general ecology, and if demand permits, one in avian ecology. Released in December 1993, Bolen's most recently published book is "Mississippi Kite: Portrait of a Southern Hawk," written with Dan Flores at the University of Montana with some photos furnished by Jack Dermid, former professor of biology at UNCW.

"I'm pleased to have been involved with the development of the graduate school at UNCW, including my day-to-day association with so many members of the faculty, staff, and administration interested in quality graduate education," he said.

In addition to his work in the graduate program, Bolen has an academic appointment as a full professor in the Department of Biological Sciences where he has regularly taught seminars and other courses in his field.

The provost is in the process of forming a search committee. Details of the search will be announced at a later date.

African-American Leadership Conference

BY KRISTI BROWN

Seaboard Reporter

The North Carolina African-American Student Leadership conference is a committee designed to develop and strengthen the leadership skills of African-Americans. It also addresses major issues that face both the African-American student and the community and proposes solutions to those issues Reggie Perry, conference chair said.

The NCAASLC was founded in the fall of 1991 by the UNCW Black Student Leadership Network. The conference united students, faculty, and staff from the 10 major N.C. universities and colleges, ten community colleges and four high schools.

The keynote speaker for NCAASLC '94 is Bev Smith, host of Black Entertainment Television's "OUR VOICES". This year's conference will be February 4-6 UNCW.

Marijuana is the drug preferred by students on the 16 University of North Carolina campuses, where drug violations doubled during the last school year, according to a report released a few weeks ago. The annual illegal drug report, given to the university system's Board of Governors, also showed minor use of cocaine, LSD, and psilocybin, a hallucinogenic drug obtained from mushrooms.

The report said there were 190 violations reported during the 1992-93 school year and that 173 involved marijuana.

"The report shows the numbers of policy violations that were dealt with by the campuses," said Cythia Bommer, associate vice president of student services for the university system. "It's not a measure of campus drug use."

She said it was impossible to say whether drug use was higher than the numbers reflected in the report. Drug violations reported on the 16 campuses of the UNC System for the 1992-93 school years:

Letters To The Editor

Dear Seahawk Editor:

Someone may want to do an article on the fact that although the Big Take Off is a nice idea for universities that are north of the Mason-Dixon line (such as Harvard) where it is cold 6-8 months out of the year and where summers are warm but not excessively hot, it might make more sense to study how much air conditioning we can do without. Winters here are about 3 1/2 months long and generally mild. Spring, summer and fall are warm to extremely hot. The buildings at UNCW are kept at a very low (cold) temperature during these months. Imagine if the air were turned off during spring and fall and people opened their windows! They would then be at the same temperature as the environment. Then in the summer (June, July and August) the air conditioning could be turned on to a minimal level so that people would not be cold but comfortably warm (if it's 90 outside, let it be 78 inside—people consider 78 degrees a very nice, comfortable temperature). There are people wearing sweaters in buildings and bringing electric blankets to dorms during April - October because the AIR CONDITIONING is so cold. In some buildings on campus the temperature is as low as 65 in the summer! Put the temp up to 78-80 and ask people to wear short sleeved shirts, no jackets, no pantyhose, 100% cotton and as they do in Bermuda even in the most formal of settings, respectable length shorts. If we are truly serious about cutting energy costs, then the dress code will be made to fit the environment, not visa versa.

Human beings invented heat (fire) in order to keep warm because they observed that too much cold is a health hazard (no one gets the flu in the summer). Let us not waste heat during the short winter but let us very closely examine the wasted electricity in the form of ridiculously low building temperatures during the other 9 months.

(Note from Editor: the author chose not to sign this letter. I wonder why?)

On the Controversy of Origins of Life

Dear Editor,

Where did the first human come from? Is this a valid question to be pursued by academics? This question can be compared to the age old question, "How did I get here?" Some believe and say that this was a supernatural act, some say it was purely natural, and some say it was a combination of these. Well, can these events be proven? Some UNCW professors think so. These may be biologists, anthropologists, chemists, paleontologists, or geologists. Some of these professors will theorize on the Creation side and some on the Evolution side. Is either side valid? If it is valid why can there not be a possible way to present a case for a particular side? Is there a professor at UNCW who is willing to publicly present his case for evolution? There is a creationist in the science field who will also present his case that I know of. Will an interested professor who is an evolutionist call me? My number is 675-9457. If you can not present your side, why do you do it every semester to over one hundred students? Why not do it in public? UNCW students want to know. Many UNCW students will be asking UNCW professors how they feel about this. A letter in this column may save some in class and outside of class inquiry.

-Raylee Stevens

In Search of Black Unity

Dear Editor,

When looking in the dictionary for the word "unity," one would find the meaning: the state of being on one accord. When it comes to unity, black people seem to have very little. As a race we are not unified. We are separated into our own little cliques. If you aren't a member of a certain "group," you're considered an outcast. I know from experience. But how can we talk about social and political changes in the world if we can't get along amongst all blacks?

Looking back on history, blacks have always had to struggle to survive, but they stuck together. It seems now that we have moved up in the world, we have forgotten from which we have come: Martin Luther King, Jr. would turn over in his grave if he saw how blacks were treating one another. We have overcome many obstacles, but we still have many to overcome, especially black-on-black violence. I have a dream of helping my people to come together as one. Maybe one day we will become as one, but we all have a lot of work to do.

A Bizarre Exit

Dear Editor,

Though I have never met Admiral Bobby Ray Inman, I feel inclined to respect his long service in the armed forces and appreciate the vast contributions he has made to the country. He had devoted over thirty years of his life to defending the peace and the principles on which it stands.

However, in view of the rose garden ceremony unintentionally belittling the president and the news conference announcing his withdrawal from the Secretary of Defense post, it is apparent that Admiral Inman has placed himself on a pedestal from which he can not be toppled. He is able to rise above the media criticism and raise serious charges against those he neither knows well nor has had little or any contact with for some time. Lacking a columnist and the senate majority leader to scandalous rumors without any evidence can be characterized as little more than a vain attempt to try and save face and possibly justify deeper reasons for an unexpected withdrawal. The service Admiral Inman has provided over many years is to be honored, but accepting the nomination of Secretary of Defense without thoroughly thinking through the consequences of a resignation can be considered a great disservice and a very unfair blow dealt to the present administration.

The Power of a Thankful Heart

I am at a place in my life where all of these everyday finds me feeling blessed and thankful with the way things are in the midst of a world filled with so much pain and suffering. Through no particular merit of my own, life is good. As a matter of fact, life can be good for most of us since, as members of this university community, we live in a place of peace, ample supplies of food and clothing, and a tomorrow that is filled with all kind of possibilities. We are free of a lot of those negative elements that oppress so many millions of people in our world.

Such freedom carries with it a significant responsibility for us, at least in my way thinking. As people who are almost given the freedom from struggling with the physical and safety needs which make up the bottom two dimensions of Maslow's hierarchy of needs, we have little excuse for not fulfilling the potential that lies within us. For most of us, each and every day begins characterized by freedom and opportunity. What an incredible gift! I am sure that this is true that all of us have problems, issues in our life with which we have to deal. But if we can keep those problems in perspective and in the context of our general well-being, these same problems become the means by which we strengthen ourselves and grow towards the kind of people we hunger to be in our hearts. For most of us, the stressors of our life are part of the growing needs inherent in beings who are growing and developing in positive directions. It helps, I think, to keep our problems in perspective by staying aware both of our blessings and millions of others who truly are so much less fortunate than we are.

Each day's tasks and struggles could have their power as stressors reduced significantly if we learned to begin each day with a thankful heart. "Count your blessings, name them, one by one; count your blessings, see what God has done..." Such thankfulness is incredibly freeing. To refocus our energies through a thankful heart is to become free to see the opportunities for growing and becoming that lay before us every single day of our lives.

Think about it. Think about the opportunity for education and personal growth that exists here for you to access the future filled with any number of opportunities and possibilities. If you can develop a thankful heart, the uncertainties of your life will begin to pale in the face of the possibilities of your life. It is all a matter of perspective.

One of the ways we defeat ourselves is letting our thankful heart get lost in a cloud of whining—whining about cafeteria food, hard classes, tight budgets, crowded schedules, and on and on. If you start your day whining about all you have to do and how far you are behind, then your perspective is cast with negative energy that will certainly drain you.

But if you start your day becoming mindful of how blessed you are, then a whole other kind of energy gets set loose that will increase the possibility of your being focused and intentional, at the end of your day, pleased with what you have accomplished. Do not underestimate the power of a thankful heart.

Out of Both Sides Of The Mouth

WASHINGTON—Minister: Louis Farrakhan's reaction to an aide's controversial speech could have marked a turning point in American race relations.

Farrakhan, leader of the Nation of Islam, had been called upon by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, members of the Congressional Black Caucus and others to distance himself from the remarks—delivered two months ago at New Jersey's Kean College—by his senior aide, Khalid Abdul Muhammad.

This speech itself was extraordinary, even for ears used to hearing anti-Semitic digs and unfounded racial accusations from certain leaders of the Nation of Islam. Jews, Muhammad charged in his Nov. 29 address at New Jersey's Kean College, control the White House, "own" the Federal Reserve Bank and manage national policy from "behind the scenes." Notwithstanding that Jews are "sucking our blood in the black community," he said, many black politicians are "in the palm of the white man's hand, but particularly in the palm of the Jewish white man's hand."

Then, almost as if to show he is not merely anti-Semitic, the speaker lit into the head of the Catholic Church ("the old, no-good Pope, you know that cracker. Somebody needs to raise that dress up and see what's really up there") and called for the slaughter of every white South African man, woman and child who fails to leave that country when blacks gain power there. The quotes, so far unchallenged by the Nation of Islam, are from the Anti-Defamation League, which says it has transcribed a recording of the speech.

It was, as I say extraordinary. But so was the response. Black leaders—especially Jackson, but also Rep. Kweisi Mfume, chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, the Rev. Al Sharpton, former representative Bill Gray and others—have denounced it as racist, anti-Semitic, damaging and untrue.

More extraordinary yet: They called on Farrakhan to repudiate Muhammad's remarks. So far he has declined to do so. Indeed, he complained on Monday of attempts to use "my brother Khalid's words against me, to divide the house."

There has long been an uneasy coexistence of mainstream black organizations with the Nation of Islam—in many ways like the relationship between the 1960s civil voice, the other its impudent, in-your-face macho voice. The two might, by now, be speaking as one. But the civil rights leadership has galled on the Nation's anti-Semitism—both as a practical political matter (Jews remain important political allies) and as a matter of true religion.

For a long time, it didn't matter much. But in recent years, Farrakhan has coveted a role in American politics, and to that end he has moved to make himself and his following less unacceptable to the mainstream.

He has met white editors and reporters (long a no-no for the organization). He has tried to be helpful to black politicians. He has softened his anti-Jewish rhetoric. He even performed a violin recital (he played Mendelssohn) as sort of peace offering to Jews.

Then during last September's Congressional Black Caucus weekend, in what many saw as a major breakthrough, Farrakhan and the mainstream black leadership appeared to reach an accord.

It was, in fact, less a breakthrough than a trap. The Rev. Benjamin Chavis, new head of the NAACP, tried, at a public forum on race, to patch things up with Farrakhan over the latter's exclusion from the commemorative March on Washington a month earlier. The minister and leaders of the movement should meet in private to work things out, Chavis said.

Farrakhan spotted the opening and went for it:

"When we have this meeting in closed session," he said, "may we iron out whatever differences we may have and make a pledge to each other that we can say in public that we will never let somebody outside of our family determine what goes on inside our family. And we will tell those who wish to exclude a member of the family from participating with the family to keep their mouth out of our family business."

Translation: Let me back into the family and don't worry what the Jews will say.

Jackson and the others have made what amounts to a counter offer: If you want to be welcome at the family roundtable, stop playing in the dirt and wash your hands.

Can Farrakhan do it? Well, I wouldn't hold dinner too long.

Fair Weather Presidency

WASHINGTON—Like the Roman god Janus from whom this month gets its name, the Clinton administration is looking in two directions. One is represented by its suddenly intense concern with crime, the other by its bizarre health care reform bill. The former represents a tendency that could consolidate a Democratic presidential era. The latter could transform Clinton's presidency into a reprise of Carter's presidency, a brief interlude in a Republican era.

Clinton's administration has not been nearly as liberal in its results—its aspirations are another matter—as many conservatives feared and some secretly hoped. However, the health care plan, with its gargantuan bureaucracies rationing everything from medicine to medical students, is a caricature of coercive and hubristic liberalism and it can crystallize a lethal perception of this presidency. But one man can save Clinton from Clinton's pet project: Senator Pat Moynihan, chairman of the Finance Committee.

To fathom the importance of Clinton's seizure of the crime issue, consider some history. The Democratic Party, advocate of an energetic federal government, surrendered the presidency in January 1969. The Democrats reacquired it for only four years in January 1977, and did so with a man who ran against Washington and was the most conservative Democrat elected president since Grover Cleveland in 1892. So when, last January, the liberal party reoccupied the presidency after, effectively, 24 years, many conservatives anticipated a government extravagant in both aspirations and expenditures.

But Congress, by imposing spending limits as a price of passing Clinton's budget, has restricted Clinton to a watery liberalism. And now, by his embrace of the crime issue, he has awakened echoes of an old argument in the Democratic Party.

In 1970 two "Jackson Democrats"—the label then referred to Sen. Henry "Scoop" Jackson, around whom moderate Democrats rallied—published a book to warn their party of a precipitous ahead. In "The Real Majority" Richard Scammon and Ben Wattenberg warned that "social issues" such as crime were acquiring a saliency comparable to economic concerns, and that the phrase "law and order" should not be disdained by liberals as racist "code words."

In February 1968, at the beginning of the Nixon campaign that began the era of Republican victories in five of six presidential elections, a Gallup poll had asked: "Is there anywhere around here—that is, within a mile—where you would be afraid to walk alone at night?" The "yes" response was: men 19 percent, women 50 percent.

Scammon and Wattenberg saw the social dynamic: Half of America's husbands had wives afraid to go out at night. In 1992—11 federal crime bills later—the "yes" response to Gallup's question was: men 29 percent, women 59 percent.

A generation has passed since Scammon and Wattenberg explained that the average voter was saying he did not expect politicians to solve all such problems. "But I do expect that any politician I vote for will be on my side." Today Clinton is using the crime issue to send to middle America an "I'm on your side" signal, the sort of signal his campaign sent by using two issues that disappeared when the campaign ended.

Those two issues were the middle class tax cut and "ending welfare as we know it," meaning a maximum of two years on welfare and then a work requirement. The patent insincerity of his tax promise has increased the political importance of his promise to welfare reform. Hence the importance of the Moynihan factor.

Moynihan's chairmanship makes him a gatekeeper for both health care reform and welfare reform. So he is in a position to impose sobriety on the former while insulating that the latter proceed. That is why Moynihan is something that virtually no Democrat in Washington has been for a generation: He is dangerous to Republican presidential aspirations. If he can make health care reform less grandiose and threatening, and can make welfare reform a fact, he will be as disorienting to, and disarming of, Republicans regarding domestic policy as the end of the Cold War has been to Republicans regarding foreign policy.

There is nice symmetry in this. In 1976, when Moynihan first ran for the Senate, he was a "Jackson Democrat," supporting Scoop Jackson in that year's primaries. Eighteen years later, that good man's influence is still felt.

As for Clinton, there is this seasonal thought as his radical health care proposal undermines his program to convince the public that liberalism is palatable. It is common for a politician to be pulled in two directions at once, but to move in opposite directions simultaneously invites comparison with the familiar mask of Janus, which is two-faced.

Don't Forget Homecoming, February 9-12

June Oravits

Me, June

1-4-3 You And Me

There's a lot of hullabaloo going on about the upcoming Homecoming festivities. Visions of flower bedecked cars cruising through campus, gilt-crowned kings and queens, and high-intensity basketball games come to mind. This is the time of the academic year when school spirit extends its rancorous head. Sometimes, I think it's the only time. What a shame.

I almost want to see some old guy feverishly checking all the classrooms to find the desk he carved his initials on about a zillion years ago, much like Holden Caulfield's old geezer in The Catcher in the Rye. Then you'd feel there's some sense of pride, continuity, belonging, and above all—a sense of school spirit.

I've run into a number of people running around campus working their baboonz off to make this Homecoming special. People every year probably expend a lot of energy into preparing for this annual fest. But how much do we pay attention to Homecoming? What does it mean to each of us?

I can't answer for anyone but myself. And, I admit, I don't even remember any mention of Homecoming at UNCW last year. That's probably my fault. Hell, it is my fault. I didn't pay any attention to anything that smacked of a social life on campus last year. I get into too much trouble when I do that. Besides, I thought non-trads can't participate. I've since changed my mind.

So, in how much of this Homecoming business should I involve myself? In trying to figure this out, I pulled out my old college yearbooks (how come we don't have yearbooks here?) from the first time I was in college about a trillion years ago. I re-read for the gazillionth time all the little notes my friends and fellow cohorts in crime scribbled in the nooks and crannies of my tattered book. Comments like, "No doubt about it, you were the life of East Dorm this year—both night and day" embarrassingly remind me of all the little peccadilloes I found myself in—on a regular basis.

There's too many weird misadventures I experienced to tell here. Some were funny and some were plain old stupid. The group I ran with were so wild, we became known as the Dirty Dozen. That comment about East Dorm may seem tame to you, but hell, there was only one women's dorm and one men's dorm if that gives you any idea about the extent of our frenzied antics. We were the life of the whole bloody campus!

It was the night of the Homecoming game which made me pause and decide I'd better mend my evil ways. After the game, a big group of us (basketball team, cheerleaders, the Dirty Dozen, and our dates) decided to get pizza and beer. Off we trooped to this pizza restaurant.

The pizza people wouldn't serve us until we paid in advance. We had plenty of money, but this pissed us off! So, I came up with this brainstorm that one of us would go out and get the exact amount we needed—in pennies. One of the basketball players, maybe old Jay from New York, ran down the street to some store or another and came back with the pennies. We piled those pennies on an empty pizza tray we swiped off someone's table and presented our payment to the manager. Boy, was he mad. Too bad, I smirked and pointed out, pennies are legal tender.

While we were enjoying our hard-earned pizza and beer, and ignoring the evil eye from the manager, someone came up with the bright idea of getting rooms at the Holiday Inn in Kinston—that exciting metropolis. Well, at least it was in a different country than our college. For once, this was not one of my zany suggestions. It was Ronnie Creel, I think, who went to the pay phone and called the Holiday Inn to make reservations. When he returned, we left the gracious hospitality of the restaurant penniless, leaving one penny in each of our beer mugs for a tip. And we were off on our new adventure.

We made quite a spectacle of ourselves in the lobby of the Holiday Inn. There's the whole basketball team wearing their matching after-game outfits, all the guys tall as Sears Tower. Behind these monsters came us—the cheerleaders (yeah, yeah, I was a cheerleader as well as a member of the Dirty Dozen—get over the shock) wearing our green uniforms with these silly green and white checkered little pantsies. We bounced around the lobby carrying these humongous green-and-white pom-poms that were bigger than our baboonz. To add more confusion and mayhem, we had our entourage of boyfriends and girlfriends roving around asking questions about the bar hours and whether or not there was a band.

There we were, a bunch of rowdies checking in to the Kinston Holiday Inn. Why they let us in the door is a mystery to me today, I'm sure they've never make that mistake again. As far as we were concerned, big city Kinston needed us. The hotel was our kingdom.

Now, old naive me thought the women were going to share a couple of rooms and the men would have a separate set of rooms. But no! Old Ronnie had reserved a room for each COUPLE. The room my honey-at-the-time Gary and I were handed the key to, turned out to be room 143. It's a sign, I think, 143 stands for I Love You (as in the number of letters per word). Okay, I think again (goah, two consecutive thoughts in one night!), I'm tired of old Gary saying I'd make a good nun, I can do this. I'll show him!

Gary opens the door, we kind of slink in and sit on the edge of the bed. Okay, here we are, what do we do now? Like, DUH! Neither one of us can look at the other. It's just way too obvious what we're suppose to be doing. Gary starts checking out his shoes, turning one shoe this way and that way. I eye my cheerleading shoes for any wayward marks and mentally compare his shoe size to mine. The boy had some major big feet. Somebody told me one time something about the theory that the size of men's feet can tell you... maybe it was the size of their hands. I don't know. All I know is that shoes were suddenly very important to both of us.

Then old Gary's arm comes creep, creep, creeping around my shoulders. I start shiv, shiv, shivering. I'm so scared even my pom-poms are shaking. Then old Gary sort of leans over and tries to kiss me. Now, we'd spent so many hours in the last few months kissing, we were experts. But now we're kissing in a real live motel room. AND THERE'S NO WAY I'M GOING TO DO THIS!

So, I jump up and run out the door (I'm so mean). Anyway, I begin pounding on all the doors up and down the walkway until my friends start coming out. I make so much noise, the manager makes us all leave—much to my great relief and the guys' annoyance. A number of people were really mad at me for awhile, especially old Gary "You'd make a great nun!" he yelled. Then he told me he'd see me in the Sunday funny papers and didn't speak to me for a long, long time. Oh, well.

Want to know something weird? A few years ago, old Gary called my parents' house to ask about me. Isn't that wild after all this time? I told my mother to tell him I was at the Holiday Inn in Kinston, room 143—and that I'm not Catholic.

So, there we have it, my big homecoming memory. Now that I've arrived at the 1994 UNCW Homecoming, I've been trying to decide how best to commemorate the occasion. I wonder if a lot of really old wizened men will show up to look for their initials. Will some of those sweet little old ladies remember trying to decide whether they were IN LOVE enough to do IT with some guy during Homecoming x-moment of years ago?

It may be alumni who show up for Homecoming bringing their memories, good, bad, or bittersweet, or it may be just the students attending UNCW who are now making their memories. Whoever, each of us has our own unique perspective on this special event. Make of it what you will and decide what you want to contribute. School spirit is in each of us, big ways and small.

What school spirit can I possibly contribute? I guess I could call up old Gary and finally put-out at the Holiday Inn. Naah! I think I'll just buy a UNCW Homecoming tee-shirt and call it my big hoorah. GO, SEAHAWKS! 143!

Don't Blink!

Stylish erotic thrillers may come and go with a blink of the eye, but they can be great fun to watch. Blink is sometimes smart, sometimes hokey, but consistently sexy. Madeleine Stowe, a woman who certainly knows how to look a man directly in the eye, stars as Emma Brody, a young musician who was blinded as a child but through a corneal transplant can now see.

Well, not exactly. There's a period of adjustment, during which objects appear blurry and may take 24 hours to register fully on the brain. The beautiful, volatile, yet vulnerable, Emma sees to much.

No sooner does Emma get delivered from 25 years of darkness, than she witnesses a murder in her apartment building.

The killer's image is imperfectly, almost surreally, planted in her consciousness. The problem of how to retrieve this information troubles Detective John Hallstrom (Aidan Quinn), who is as turned on by Emma as he is turned off by the serial killer/rapist they are trying to track down. Obviously, Emma's testimony is ridiculed by Hallstrom's fellow cops, but he believes her. I wonder why? Quinn, himself blinded by desire, and Stowe sizzle.

The victims all turn out to have first been transplant patients of some kind, like Emma herself. The story of Hallstrom and Emma's stormy mutual infatuation works much better than the actual whodunit, which is clinched and hokey. Hallstrom may be the hottest cop since Mickey Rourke in 9 1/2 weeks, but he's certainly not the brightest. The plot is so thin I don't mind giving it away. The killer turns out to be right under the noses of Emma and Hallstrom. Too much of the conclusion defies sense, but then, Blink depends on plenty of atmosphere and a few good dramatic moments.

ONYX

By Sam Cuthrell
Entertainment Writer

I wasn't sure what to expect on the way to the Onyx show Saturday night. I'll be the first to admit that I know even less about rap than I do about jazz (let me just go ahead and say that my favorite rap artist is Doug E. Fresh, who is so old he's probably already dead).

The show got its first thumbs-up as soon as we got in the door - the bouncers frisked me. You know it's going to be a good show when they make you pull your wallet out to make sure it's not an assault rifle. I even tried to get the second bouncer to frisk me for good measure, but he mumbled something that sound like "Get out of here, you sicko" and pushed me out of the way.

The floor was completely packed with sweating bodies by 11 p.m., an it only got more compacted as the night went on. I'd considered donning a toboggan so no one would know that I wasn't a serious rap music fan, but my aversion to sweatbaths made the question moot. I don't know how everybody with toboggans and coats kept from passing out.

The opening bands sort of blended together (there were five or six of them), but it was my first opportunity to see some of Wilmington's own rap music acts. It was good to see them get some exposure at a show with such high attendance.

Set-up times between the bands was really short, because there were no instrument changes at all. The most time-consuming part was watching the bewildered bouncers trying to untangle the rat-nest of microphone cords that resulted from having up to twenty people jumping around on stage at the same time.

The building was so packed, the bouncers were having a hard time parading the crowd - as a result, there was a lot of underage drinking going on, as well as some slightly more dangerous activities. The two guys standing behind me were taking on a joint of such proportion that even the infamous Cheech and Chong would have been proud.

Onyx finally took the stage sometime after midnight, storming out wearing massive black ski parkas and backpacks. The parkas didn't last long, as the aforementioned temperature was hovering somewhere around the boiling point.

I kept waiting for the show to "take off" (i.e., for the pit to emanate from the front and envelop the entire crowd). Sad to say, I had gotten too used to the Biohazard version of "Slam" on MTV. The instrument-less version was not quite what I had anticipated, however, being a provisional, never-say-die type of guy, I still managed to sky-dive (or did the guy throw me?) into the pit.

All things taken into account, the show was definitely a new experience for me. I'd never seen a band without instruments (that guy with the turntables was pretty cool, though, huh-huh). Onyx's lyrics were more straightforward than most shows I've seen (sex and drugs were a major topic), and I didn't agree with some of the band's ideas ("* peace, we want justice" isn't politically correct, is it?).

Onyx put on a good live show (especially for a band without any instruments), and it was nice to see them let the score of local bands open up. If you missed the show, there's no way that I can describe it that would give them justice - you just should have been there.

Gibson/Miller To Palomino

Up until now, when musicians blended country roots and rock 'n' roll energy, it was called "country rock." But when the labelers get an earful of the Gibson/Miller Band, they're going to need a new tag. Call it "turbo twang" for now - long on energy, short on frills and filled with raging guitars, inescapable hooks and vocals that combine bravado with full-throttle fun.

In 1990, after years of chasing their separate muses, seasoned Nashville songwriter Dave Gibson met Detroit rock veteran Blue Miller. They came together like two musical freight trains, throwing off some of the freshest musical sparks heard in Music City in a long time.

Where There's Smoke, Gibson/Miller's Epic debut, is coming from a new place - where north meets south, where hard-core country meets old time rock 'n' roll, where a weeping steel guitar is right at home next to a cranked-up Les Paul and where deeply rooted, from-the-heart song writing comes face-to-face with blood-and-guts, blue collar boogie.

Ironically, the Gibson/Miller Band was born almost by accident. Epic VP of A&R Doug Johnson was looking for a new source for songs when he introduced Gibson to Miller, figuring they'd have some interesting chemistry. When he got the duo's first demos, he heard a sound that stopped him cold and hastened to sign not only the two writers, but the band who made their demos!

The Gibson/Miller Band will be performing at The Palomino club on Friday, February 4th!

Two UNCW Professors Awarded $10,330 to Study Fisheries

BY LYNN BENSON
Public Relations Intern

Two biology professors from the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, Ileana Clavijo and David Lindquist, will study how marine reserves function while testing two models of light-traps, an experimental method never used before in North Carolina.

A $10,330 grant awarded from the Cooperative Institute for Fisheries Oceanography in Raleigh will fund the study.

Initial funding for the project came from a $1,400 award from UNCW's Charles L. Cahill Faculty Research and Development Fund.

Light traps, used successfully by the National Marine Fisheries in Florida and by other researchers along the Great Barrier Reef in Australia, can be used to attract and capture the larval stages of reef fishes at night. The light-traps will be used to trace the movement of the larvae in order to test two ideas about identifying the source of the larvae. One idea suggests reef fish larvae are produced by adults located "downstream" of North Carolina's reefs and that larvae are carried here by the Gulf Stream. Another idea suggests larvae are produced by adults on nearby North Carolina reefs.

"Because the snapper and grouper reef fishery have been severely stressed by overharvest," Lindquist said, "the National Marine Fisheries Service has proposed marine fishery reserves for the Atlantic coast from Florida to North Carolina. The premise is that these preserves will protect the large adult fish that can produce larger numbers of eggs and larvae. These larvae can potentially recruit to the down-stream non-reserve reefs. As a preliminary test, we will attempt to identify intrusions of Gulf Stream waters at our study area using satellite imagery and current meters in order to see if Gulf Stream intrusions bring large catches of larvae," Lindquist said.

If no evidence is found for Gulf Stream intrusion, the study may reveal some reef populations to be self-perpetuating. However, Lindquist suspects longer lived larvae will come from Gulf Stream movement.

Last year several regional public meetings were held by the Charleston-based South Atlantic Fisheries Management Council, which presides over the area from North Carolina to Florida. The public was the against closing off sections of the continental shelf to fishing for reserves. The National Marine Fisheries Service, under the Department of Commerce, has recognized the importance of reserves in the conservative of fishery resources.

Two graduate students and several undergraduate students from UNCW will participate in various phases of the study. The project is also receiving support from UNCW's Center for Marine Science Research.

The proposal, "Is the Gulf Stream the Source of the Presettlement Phase of Reef Fishes in Southern Onslow Bay, North Carolina? —Field Testing of Light-Traps," is funded through Aug. 31, 1994.

UNCW is mobilizing to support the Southeast Regional Science Olympiad Competition for middle high school students. The competition will take place from 9:30 a.m. - 3:30 p.m., Saturday, Feb. 5. Events ranging from eggs being dropped to paper planes being flown will be held all over the Laney High School campus. Most activities will take place in the gym.

Specialty events are being led by Dr. Tom Shafer, biology; Dr. Hidelisa Hernandez, physics; Dr. Bart Jones, Dr. Fred Hornack and Dr. Louis Adcock, chemistry; and Dr. Jack Hall and Dr. Rudi Keifer, earth sciences, directing the Science Olympiad is Wayne Hanson of the UNCW Science and Math Alliance office (350-3987). The UNCW contingent will be joined by engineers and scientists from CP&L, GE, Corps of Engineers, Cape Industries and local engineering societies to cover the broad spectrum of events.

More than 400 students from eight Southeastern North Carolina counties are expected to compete as part of 12 high school and 24 middle school teams. First, second, and third place medals will be awarded in each event as well as team trophies for the two divisions. Two high school and five middle school teams will go to state competition March 19 in Raleigh.

A Talk With...

Dr. Roger Lowery

BY KRISTY SHUMAKER
News Editor

"I guess I didn't really seriously consider teaching until I was an undergraduate," said Dr. Roger Lowery, a Political Science professor here at UNCW since 1974. "It looked like a very appealing and intellectually challenging lifestyle. And I thought then, and I still do, that you can make a difference in people's lives."

Lowery came to UNCW from Southern Illinois University at Edwardsville and Washington University at St. Louis, Mo., where he finished his doctoral work. He teaches American National Government Part II, Research Methods in Political Science and American Parties and Pressure Groups.

"I wanted to come to a small campus that was focused on undergraduate research and I was very fortunate, coming right out of the doctoral program, to get what I was looking for," he said. "That year there were something like 700 new Ph.D.'s and 300 advertised jobs in political science. I was looking for a campus with smaller departments, smaller classes, an undergraduate focus and that's what I got. I like working more one-on-one with students."

"I had always seen huge mass lecture sections on Midwestern campuses, with 1,500 students in one section, and didn't think that was a very good approach to undergraduate education. It was more of an assembly-line approach. Some students can thrive in that kind of setting but I don't think the average student does. I think the average student would be better in a classroom setting. It takes an exceptional student who's very self-directed and doesn't need the interaction in the classroom to round out his education."

Lowery said that in larger schools senior faculty teach upper-division or graduate-level courses predominantly. If they do "teach" the mass-enrollment courses, they just give the lecture and discussions are managed by teaching assistants and graduate students.

"They're not necessarily all bad," he said. "Some graduate students make very good teachers, but they have a full-time job working on their own degree. Most of them are clearly focused and rightly so, first on completing their degree and then secondly on trying to do a good job in the classroom."

Lowery said there were some professors who stood at the lectern and basically just read from the textbook. "It's an insult to your intelligence and it's mind-numbing. Your brains turn to oatmeal in a class like that."

"I think most faculty at UNCW are concerned about doing a good job in the classroom. I certainly think that's true in my department." There are a lot of different approaches to teaching, he said, but no single approach works for every student. Lowery's approach is to set high standards and hold students to them, but to work hard to provide as much assistance to students as he can without lowering those standards.

"We have a responsibility, not just to the student, but to society at large to uphold standards. That's important to the student as well, because if standards are lowered, then the degree is devalued. Largely, that's what happened over time in high school. A high school diploma once meant much more than it has in later years. There's a danger of that same thing happening at the baccalaureate level."

Lowery said that not only were the classes different in the Midwest, but so were the students. Students were better prepared for college in the 1960s. In his day, a smaller proportion of high school graduates went on to college.

There was more economic opportunity for those who had only a high school diploma. At that time, colleges and universities hadn't grown to the size where they could handle large volumes of students, Lowery said. Therefore, admission standards were more selective and campuses were smaller.

Then the tide turned and college enrollment swelled virtually overnight. However, Lowery said, "The preparation available to the students in elementary and secondary school declined in the intervening years between the early 60s and more recent years. There have been all sorts of problems in American public education at the pre-college level that forced colleges lower standards." For example, many students come to the university ill-prepared in mathematics. If colleges and universities required a real college-level Algebra, which was required when I was an undergraduate, a lot of students would just simply fail college-level Algebra. They're not adequately prepared at the high school level, so we have what I call Math Appreciation as the basic math requirement."

This downward trend reversed and the UNC System recently ratcheted up admission standards on the 16 academic programs, Lowery said, signaling a recognition that admission standards needed to be higher in this state.

He said while UNCW offers a broad, reasonably comprehensive Basic Studies program, changes need to be made. Including the addition of a 3-hour library instruction course. Very few students come to the university adequately prepared to use a modern library. "Libraries are very rapidly changing and becoming highly automated. It's not just a question of being able to use the old catalog and a couple of periodical indexes."

Other changes, Lowery said: "I think it's pretty late to address foreign language competencies. I think that needs to be started at the primary grades. I hope that as part of the reform of education at the pre-college level will be recognition that we're in a world economy now and if we're going to be competitive internationally we need a much higher percentage of our population, especially our college educated population, with real language skills."

"That's a change that we can't accomplish, and most changes I'd like to see can't be accomplished at the university level unless there's major change at the pre-collegiate level." Lowery said students need much better pre-collegiate training in math, history, geography and composition.

"Education is in bad shape now for a lot of different reasons and most of them are outside the school itself," he said. Lowery attributed a lot of the problems to a much higher proportion of women entering the work force than 30 years ago. Today, women are faced with many more career options.

"Thirty years ago we could pay the classically low salaries that are paid to teachers and still get very dedicated and very bright people because there was a large pool of women who could go into nursing or education. Those were the professional career tracks that were largely open to them. A lot of those bright and skilled women will not consider public education anymore because the salaries are so low and the prestige is so low. It's harder to attract very good people to go into education than it was a generation ago."

Lowery said curriculum also declined as more women entered the work force. With fewer full-time mothers at home, television has been used as a babysitter. "Pop down the toddlers in front of it and let 'em stare at the boob tube," he said. "It's not at all an interactive, intellectually stimulating setting and it ingrains a passivity in kids who are raised on hundreds of hours of television."

The average American has spent more time sitting in front of the T.V. than sitting in a classroom by the time he graduates from high school, Lowery said. "T.V. has been a very bad influence if for no other reason than children don't read," he said. "Reading is the whole key to educational success at the college level. I find that very few students really have adequate, critical reading skills. They don't view reading as a positive activity. It's seen as a chore, as something to be avoided. Reading assignments are commonly ignored and if they're done, they're not adequately done. The analysis skills, the comprehension skills are just not there because that takes a lot of practice."

Lowery said a major problem with students today is that they expect, either consciously or unconsciously, to be entertained in the classroom. "Learning often involves work—investment of a lot of time and effort," he said. "It can be rewarding and satisfying but it nonetheless does involve a lot of effort. T.V. requires no effort. It has just sort of brainwashed a couple of generations now."

Lowery said he grew up in the midst of television, too. His father ran a hardware store and his house had a T.V. from 1947 on. "I literally grew up with T.V. but my mom was a public librarian," he said. "There was a lot of reading in my house. I used to read a book a day in the summer. Although I had a T.V., there was still a very profound emphasis on reading, reading for pleasure as well as for education. You don't find that emphasis in very many households and it's an enormous handicap to overcome, not to have acquired a love of reading and very sharp critical reading skills. Very few students have those."

For real change to happen in education, parents need to turn off the T.V. and send primary school kids to the library, Lowery said. Parents don't involve themselves enough in education. Most parents think local schools are great. He said years ago more parents were willing to assist children in their education, partly because at least one didn't have a full-time job. Today, parents confronted by economic pressures have less time to spend with the kids.

Another problem Lowery pointed to is a strain of anti-intellectualism in American culture. History offers models such as Andrew Jackson, who had little formal education and appealed to the common man. "Beavis and Butthead" glorifies ignorance and exemplifies an anti-intellectual set of values," he said. "The mass media are aimed at the least common denominator."

Lowery criticized a statute recently passed by the N.C. Legislature that will impose a 25 percent surcharge on students who don't graduate within four years. The statute takes effect in 1995. "I think they've been too preemptive. They haven't done enough homework before arriving at a policy judgment in graduation and retention rates," he said.

"They're not happy with so many students dropping out, the retention rate being low and with so many students not graduating 'on time,' at the end of eight semesters," he said he didn't think legislators had done their homework on why so many students tend to drop out and why students don't tend to graduate in high enough numbers after eight semesters. "In effect, what they're telling the university is, 'We want to improve those progression and graduation rates and we don't really care how you do it.'"

"Major reasons why the progression and graduation rate is as low as it is are factors that are pretty much beyond the control of the university, such as a very high percentage of students entering not prepared to do university-level work. That's largely beyond our control, as is the high percentage of students who attempt to take a full-time load while also working full-time jobs."

Legislators think progression and retention rates are low because UNC schools have too many hidden degree requirements and too many majors have too many hours required for students to graduate in four years. "Those simply are not significant factors in my view," Lowery said.

"I think the worst-case scenario is that pressure from the legislature will turn university education into what primary and secondary education turned into: lowered standards and social promotion."

Lowery said students had been passed through at the pre-collegiate level because of enormous pressure to meet quotas set up by bean counters, state legislators and school boards that assume a high graduation rate is a measure of teaching success and a high failure rate is evidence that the education system has failed. "Then it's the school's fault and the principal's fault and the classroom teacher's fault, not recognizing that there are larger social forces schools are up against."

In the legislators' defense, they do have an obligation to the taxpayers of N.C. to look into how much money is being spent for higher education in the UNC System, Lowery said. Every academic year, tax dollars pay roughly $5,000 of each college student's educational costs. According to a recent publication, the legislature pays 89 percent of each in-state student's full-time cost. "Clearly the legislature has a right to be concerned that that money is being spent appropriately," he said.

Lowery said the legislature failed to take into account factors that explain why students fall behind and drop out, though. He said if a student hasn't graduated on time due to poor planning or not taking enough hours, then the charge is legitimate. But if the student must also hold down a full-time job while attending school, then there's an equity issue.

"There are a lot of working-class folks who cannot afford to go full-time because they have to work full-time," Lowery said. "There are also students who go to the university to party and they are wasting the taxpayers' money. They manage to make a high enough grade point average that they can stay in and just attend semester after semester. These are the kind of students the T-shirt said in the bookstore talk about — 'UNCW the best seven of eight years of my life.' It is appropriate that those students, for the extra fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth year of their undergraduate life, should have to pay a surcharge."

"However, there are lots of students who are not partying but not taking a full-time load for a legitimate reason. I think it's undeniably unfair to put an economic penalty on those students who are already economically disadvantaged. I think it's putting the university and the state in a situation where there very well could be legal challenges to that policy on grounds of class discrimination."

Lowery blamed low retention and graduation rates on pre-collegiate schools. He said many students come to the university unprepared to do university-level work. "A lot of students, when faced with university-level academic requirements, if they haven't been prepared by the public schools, many have the innate ability and often do, but it takes them a while to make up for the weak educational background they came from." He said these students shouldn't be discarded, but instead the university should help them through remediation.

"It is incontestably the case that there are a lot of bad schools in N.C. at the pre-collegiate level," Lowery said. "Now, they are improving, but if you accept the assumption that a lot of students have been disadvantaged because they happen to have been born at the wrong place or their parents moved to the wrong place so that they went to a bad school that didn't prepare them for university-level work, then the fault is the system's. We ought to work with those students. I'm sympathetic to that philosophy."

However, the legislature has been unwilling to fund large-scale remediation at the college level. "A very different perspective on all this," Lowery said, "is that the public schools will never really improve until a high proportion of public school graduates go to the university and flunk out very quickly and aren't offered any such remediation. Then a lot of parents are literally going to raise hell about the failure of the public schools to adequately prepare their children. That would be a very quick way of disabusing a lot of people in the voting public of the misimpression that their own public school is above average and doing fine."

"There's a widespread recognition that public schools aren't doing a good job in general but there's an equally widespread recognition that our local school, whenever that is, is doing okay," Lowery said. "This is common, not just in N.C., but also nationwide. The typical parent thinks the public schools are pretty bad, but 'my' public school is doing a good job."

"A very hard-eyed approach to all this would be to maintain rigorous academic standards," he said. "Since we're not funded by the state to do significant remedial work, don't do it, and just flunk out very high percentages of first-year students. That would send a real wake-up call." Lowery said such a measure would be highly controversial and unfair to students who come to the university form weak academic backgrounds.

"There is fault to be placed on the student's shoulders to the extent that a lot simply aren't motivated to do university-level work," Lowery said. "Part of it is that work hasn't been instilled by significant academic standards at the lower level. The typical student has slid through the pre-collegiate level doing very little homework. Then when they're expected to do a lot at the university level it's a big adjustment."

Lowery thinks some of UNCW's graduates—but not all—will be able to compete in the work force. He said undergraduates should concentrate on getting a broad-based education, working as little as possible in outside jobs and devoting themselves as much as possible to their academic careers. "If that means relying on a bicycle instead of a car or an old junker instead of a newer car, make that sacrifice now because your education is the best long-term investment you can make."

Lowery said students should commit to working as much outside their majors as inside. "In career terms it will give you a broad perspective and a variety of skills that will make you flexible in a very rapidly changing work environment. The people who are going to survive professionally are the people who can adapt to change."

"Do not view an undergraduate education as a 'tech school.' View an undergraduate education as giving you as many skills, in many areas and as broad a background across diverse approaches to life as possible, because neither you nor anybody else can predict what your job is going to look like 10 years from now. It will be different."

Deborah Haywood, Chair of the Cape Fear Host Committee, and Jennifer Phelps, Co-Chair of the Cape Fear Host Committee and a senior nursing student at UNCW, presented the NAMES Quilt earnings check for $9,104.40 to Nina Brown, a GROW representative.

The money was raised during the weekend of Oct. 21-24, 1993, when the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt was on display at UNCW. Funding of the project came through contributions and donations made by corporate sponsors and individuals. All proceeds left over from display expenses were set aside to benefit GROW: A community Service Corporation. This non-profit organization will use this money to give direct care to people living with HIV/AIDS in our community.

Deborah Haywood states, "those of us who worked to bring the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt to Wilmington are very appreciative of the warmth, caring and generous financial support shown by the community for the worthy project."

SGA Elections

BY SHANNON DAVIS
SGA Correspondent

The Student Government Association is holding their spring elections on March 1 and 2. Registration for these elections is Monday, Jan. 31 through Monday, Feb. 14 at 5 p.m.

The offices that are coming available are Student Body President, Student Body Vice President, Attorney General, Student Services Coordinator, Sophomore, Junior, and Senior class officers, and eight Spring Representatives at Large.

"I would like to encourage students to run in our spring election," said S.G.A. Vice President Jeff Gurkin. "I think S.G.A. is a positive way for students to have a say in how their fees are spent and to have an active voice as to what goes on our campus."

To run for Student Body President and Vice President, you must have been in the Senate for one full term. To run for Attorney General, you have to have been involved in the Senate for one academic year. All other offices are open to anyone.

Voting will be on March 1 and in the University Center from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., in Wagoner Hall from 11 a.m. to 1:45 p.m. and from 4:30 p.m. to 6:45 p.m. and in Randall Library from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Two seats have opened up on the Student Government Senate. The positions available are sophomore class officer and Spring representative at large.

These offices are open to any student who is willing to devote a little time to SGA's motto of "Students Serving Students." SGA is a great opportunity to get involved with UNCW.

Applications for these positions are due Monday, Feb. 7 at 5 p.m.

"Shattered Dreams, Broken Legs."

Don't you just hate it when people constantly remind you of all of those petty little things that people are supposed to do or not do in public if they are to be considered "civilized?" Don't interrupt when others are talking. Don't stare or point your finger at someone (even if they have purplish-green hair and a myriad of rings dangling from their nose). Don't pick your nose and then wipe it under the seat, or worse yet, flick it across the room at an unsuspecting friend. (I really can't believe I just said that.) Or, as I was recently reminded, don't talk with your mouth full. Actually, I was told by University Center Building Manager Attendant Person Dawn Boone, and I quote, to not "chew with your mouth full."

Semi-coherent readers will no doubt make note that it would in fact be quite difficult not to "chew with your mouth full." The point of all this is not to lay blame on an honest, hard working University Center Building Manager Attendant Person, nor was it to gross readers out by discussing nose-picking. It was however, necessary to introduce the first story this week.

It seems that minding one's manners can really pay off in certain situations. In a freak story out of New York City and as reported by the US Department of Really Wild Stories, Violent Crime Division, an unidentified man was stabbed several times while waiting to catch a bus. The assailant, who did not flee, was arrested and charged with assault with a deadly weapon, inflicting serious injury. When asked about the attack, the suspect replied, "he stepped in front of me and never said 'excuse me.'" I guess that will make you think twice about chewing with your mouth full!

Speaking of manners, I had to put my best on this past Monday, as I went for my much awaited medical school interview at the East Carolina School of Medicine. The highlight of the trip was not my usual stop at the John Deere Tractor Museum near Plink Hill, North Carolina. It was instead, my visit to the Greenville offices of Shaft, Shaft, and Finagler, attorneys at law. Yes friends, they actually have an office complex there larger than the one on Seventeenth Street here in Wilmington. The irony of it all is their "Have You Been Injured Through No Fault of Your Own and at the Hands of

As always, your comments, suggestions, E-Mail (PWS7491), and non-perishable food donations are certainly welcomed.

Some Greedy, Maliciously Inclined Doctor" advertisement which stands not three hundred yards from the University Medical Center. You figure.

The interviews went pretty well, and I'm looking forward to hearing from either ECU or UNC sometime between now and 1998. They asked me what I wrote about here in The Fishwrap and so I told them of my NoBull Prize winning pieces, praising such things as the UNCW Bookstore, Campus Police, University Birth Control Distribution Center, and my old friend Lisa Kellogg. One professor actually requested a copy of the issue about the prehistoric rat urine.

Turning now to national news, this Nancy Kerrigan/Tonya Harding stuff is taking on the appearance of a low budget daytime soap opera. In the latest installment, Harding's (ex?) husband Jeff Gouliotooily revealed that Harding had originally tried to hire Lorena Bobbitt to "cut off Nancy's foot" to keep her out of the Olympics. Harding, who maintains her innocence, is reportedly considering admitting her guilt and using the Menendez "I was afraid for my life and had Nancy beaten out of pure fear" defense. In a related story, pop singer Michael Jackson has claimed he has nothing to do with the attack and has reportedly paid both sides a huge amount of money not to implicate him.

In honor of this whole affair, and since speculations are that the whole event will soon be a CBS miniseries (if FOX doesn't out bid them), I have come up with my very own cast for what I would title, "Shattered Dreams, Broken Legs."

Nancy Kerrigan: Sally Strothers (she doesn't fit the part, but it would get her away from those correspondence school ads)

Tonya Harding: Rebecca DeMornay (good in those sadistic roles)

Jeff Gouliotooily: Joe Pesci (little Guido sort of fellow)

The hit man: Chris Farley, from Saturday Night Live or John Goodman (the resemblance is amazing)

US Olympic (loves to play himself)

The HAT'S OFF award this week goes to Barbara Rogers, of the Dean of Students Office. I'm sure she does not remember, but she helped me out with a problem once back when I was a wee freshman here at Seahawk High. Besides, I understand that she is a faithful, semi-coherent reader. Thanks

Protecting Yourself With R.A.D.

BY MATHIEU BLACKSTONE
Contributing Reporter

Melinda is a freshman here at UNCW. She has just joined a sorority and has been invited to a party by her new-found friends. Like most parties there is alcohol and Melinda as well as most of the other people there have been drinking.

Later on in the evening, she is invited upstairs by a fraternity brother for a tour of the house. They entered one of the bedrooms and he begins to make advances. Melinda does not mind until he begins to go a little too far. What should she do?

This is the question that the Rape Aggression Defense systems try to help women answer. There are 190 instructors across 18 states. The first two UNCW classes of the R.A.D. program graduated last week. Of three types of rape, acquaintance rape is the most common. Over 90 percent of college rapes are of this kind.

R.A.D. is not just a self-defense course. It does not teach martial arts. It shows women how to use their own bodies as weapons (i.e. elbows, knees, and head). The class consists of two hours of lecture and 19 hours of hands-on training.

The lectures teach women how to be aware of their surroundings and how to avoid dangerous situations. "The hands-on training gives women confidence in their own strength and allows women to escape some of the traditional stereotypes of female daintiness," says officer Shawn Thomas, a certified R.A.D. instructor. "If the women are not hitting hard and do not show confidence by the last night of the course, they will not graduate."

Rape has not been a large problem on the UNCW campus, at least not a reported problem. There have been a few reported incidents of rape to Campus Police with the last year and most have been out of their jurisdiction. But, the R.A.D. program teaches women basic defense skills that will last a lifetime.

The R.A.D. courses are held from 7:30 to 9:00 p.m., either Mondays and Wednesdays or Tuesdays and Thursdays. The next sessions start February 7th and 8th and will be held at the Hawk's Nest. "All sorts of women take the course including faculty and staff. Thomas said there is no fee but a $12 manual is required. For more information call Campus Police.

Letter to the Editor

The "Ultimate" Thanks You

We would like to personally thank Dr. Leutze and Mark Lanier for their support and generosity in making it possible for the UNCW Seamen Ultimate Team to compete in the 1993 Ultimate World Championships. Our journey started at 202 Rose Avenue and ended in Madison, Wisconsin. After more than 20 hours of driving and stopping to inhale some great American air, we finally arrived at our destination—The World Championships. We played a week-long tournament of grueling Ultimate and after it was all over, we finished ranked 18th in the world.

Being able to travel to this tournament and participate helped our team to improve a great deal. Many of the returning players had a chance to play against some of the best ultimate teams in the world. Against the 2nd ranked team in the tournament, Boston Big Brothers, the Seamen took a 6-0 lead, but we were unable to hold on for the victory. We did gain the respect of every team at the tournament with this performance. Furthermore, the Seamen played a game against the Wilmington Club team called the Port City Slickers, who finished 8th in the world and had many former UNCW players.

Currently, UNCW Men's Ultimate Club President, Brian Linkfield said, "We felt that by participating in this tournament we were able to get more experience on how to play and teach the game of Ultimate." The UNCW Seamen are the first college team to compete in the World Championships. Our national reputation will definitely help us in our fundraising efforts to further increase our budget and make it possible to compete against the best teams in the country.

As many of you probably know, the Seamen were the 1993 Collegiate Division I National Champions. We were the only athletic club or varsity sport at UNCW to accomplish such a lofty feat in 1993. With the experience of the World Championship and the amazing quality of our new players, we are striving for a second consecutive Collegiate National Championship.

In closing, we would like to thank Dr. Leutze, Mark Lanier, the Student Government Association and the University for supporting us and letting us play the game of Ultimate Frisbee. For any non-believers or future baby Seamen or Seaweed (Women's Ultimate), come check it out every Tuesday and Thursday at Brooks Field at 3:30 p.m. or in the Sports Club Council Office in the University Union.

Sincerely,

UNCW Seamen

Lady Seahawks Drop Two

Seahawks fall to Richmond and James Madison

The Seahawks women start a three-game road swing, beginning at East Carolina on Thursday at 7 p.m., after a pair of Colonial Athletic Association losses over the weekend.

UNCW came close to winning its first conference game of the season on Sunday. But Richmond battled back from a 10-point halftime deficit, outscoring UNCW 22-8, over the final five minutes to complete the comeback. Sophomore guard Denise Marsh poured in a career-high 17 points against Richmond, connecting on a school-record four three-pointers in the first half.

Junior transfer Kelly Norton continued her recent strong play with 10 points and a career-best 13 boards. The latter Spider outrebounded UNCW, 47-32, and tallied 20 offensive boards, which hurt the Seahawk women down the stretch.

Against James Madison on Friday, the Ducks shot a sizzling 66 percent from the field in the first half on route to a 22-point halftime lead, and held on for a 73-59 victory. Norton paced the Seahawk women with a career-high 17 points, while Marsh had 10 points and five assists. Junior forward Myra Horton paces the team offensively with 12.8 ppg. Norton has been on a tear in recent outings, averaging 10.6 ppg and 8.0 rpg over the last five games.

Following Thursday's game at ECU, the Seahawks women are off until they travel to the Washington, D.C. area for games at George Mason (Feb. 11) and American (Feb. 13). UNCW returns home Feb. 18 against Old Dominion.

Next game tonight at East Carolina

The Comeback

UNCW defeats East Carolina

BY SHANNON MCBRIDE

Sports Writer

The UNCW men's and women's swim team rallied from behind to outswim conference rival East Carolina 124-117 and 124-119 respectively, last Saturday.

Although Coach Allen was expecting a close meet, he was somewhat surprised at the outcome. With the women trailing by 25 points midway through the meet, Allen said, "I thought we could compete with first place finishes, but thought ECU had more depth."

Even though Allen was concerned, he knew the women were strong at the end, and that "they had to hang tough to stay close."

Not only did the women rise to the occasion and stay close to ECU, they tied them at 113 before the last event, the 400 Freestyle Relay. And with a school record breaking time of 3:36.63, Fathom Houtz, Christel Smith, Darci Daggett, and Deb Kresho, clinched the meet for the Lady Seahawks.

The men's team found themselves in a similar situation. Leading by two points before the last event, the men, too, had to win the last relay in order to win the meet. And with the crowd on their feet, the relay team of Doug Shanks, Chris Guastello, Drew Whorley, and Jamie Elk, came from behind to touch out ECU 3:11.81 to 3:11.83.

Although Allen was pleased with both relays, he said "they just happened to be the last event. Everyone else helped just as much in getting to the victory."

Next meet will be this Sat. at N.C. State

When asked what gave the Seahawks the extra edge, Coach Allen said, "the team didn't seem to panic when behind. We felt confident, and did the best we could in every event."

Allen also attributes part of the win to the energetic and supportive crowd.

Double winners for the women were diver Kelli Sutton, Karla Zick, and Deb Kresho. Sutton broke a school record on the One-Meter Board (274.05) and won the Three-Meter (260.325). Zick placed first in the 200 Individual Medley (2:13.55) and the 500 Freestyle (5:08.62), while Kresho took the 50 Freestyle (25.17) and the 100 Freestyle (54.93).

Burak Erdem was the only double winner for the men, sweeping the 200 Individual Medley (1:57.17) and the 200 Backstroke (1:52).

Other top finishers for the men were Jamie Elk in the 100 Freestyle (47.73), Murat Erdem in the 200 Butterfly, and Peter Flores on the One-Meter Board.

Allen is trying not to read too much into the victory over ECU. He said "it will be a brand new day at conference," and doesn't want the team to become overconfident.

Next Saturday the Seahawks swim their last dual meet of the season at N.C. State. "Realistically," Allen said, "they are one of the best teams in the ACC, but if we go in with the same attitude—competitive and aggressive—there will be good swims, and good races."

THEY SAID IT....

Senior Athlete Profile

BY JOELLE KIBLER
Sports Writer

Claudio Siterberg, a native of San Paulo, Brazil, is a senior on this year's UNCW Men's Tennis team. He will graduate in May with a degree in marketing.

Claudio started playing tennis at the age of nine with his brother, hitting around with their parent's wooden tennis rackets. (Claudio has greatly been influenced by his brother, who now is a professional and has always been a top player in his country.) At ten years of age, Claudio began playing tournaments and from then on he played year-round where ever tennis was available. In high school Claudio played tennis as an exchange student in Virginia. Then he returned to Brazil, his brother was offered a scholarship to play tennis in Tennessee. His brother began telling him how good it was to play college tennis, so this sparked Claudio's interest in wanting to play tennis himself in the U.S. Claudio played at a Junior College in Tennessee, before he transferred to UNCW on a scholarship because of the desire to play Division I Tennis.

Claudio feels he has personally benefited from being on an athletic team. He believes playing a sport and academics go together. "If I don't do good in school, I won't do good in tennis," states Claudio. He also feels that competing in tennis is a part of his daily routine and if he doesn't get to compete, he stresses out on school work.

Entering his final season as a Seahawk, Claudio has high expectations for the Men's Tennis team. "We lost some good players last year, but we have been practicing very hard and should do good this semester," states Claudio. Claudio's personal expectation is to win as many matches as he can. "I think it will be one of my good seasons. I am confident—I'm a senior now and I have accomplished what I didn't know before, which puts me in a higher confidence level being around for a long time, but it will be tough," Claudio comments.

There has been a variety of influential people that have helped Claudio during his career at UNCW. Coach Honeycutt and his assistant have helped Claudio with his mechanics, especially his tennis strokes. Claudio also states, "Academically they are there for anything you need and any other matters." Throughout his two years here, Claudio speaks highly of the faculty couple—Dr. and Mrs. Toplin. "They really have helped me with everything—school and with what I am today here in Wilmington. They support me through good times and bad," comments Claudio. His family has also been supportive of Claudio, although there are many miles between them. Claudio is very close to his family and comments, "Despite it being hard to be away from the family, they all know it was the best for me."

Claudio has some good qualities that have made his stay at UNCW a success. He is very optimistic and is happy with what he is doing with his life. This determined young man states, "Even though sometimes I see that things are almost impossible, I will only see it as impossible until I have tried it." Claudio also feels the mental part of his tennis game has helped him too. "Using a positive self-image helps me to feel better and it really reflects what goes on," states Claudio.

Claudio's future plans include some tennis tournaments but nothing at the professional level. He would like to stay here one more year after graduation and get his "academic grounds here for working at a multi-international market company." After Claudio's desire to be an international marketer, he would like to open his own business wherever he sees the highest profit margin (probably Brazil).

Claudio was selected this year to receive the honor of being in Who's Who in American College Universities and is a member of the American Marketing Association (AMA).

Reflecting on his UNCW experience, Claudio states, "So many things happened going back and forth from here and Brazil. I've really learned how to be self-dependent and responsible. The friends and people I met here are great and I will try to keep in touch with them. I really enjoyed the atmosphere here. My expectations went above whatever I had thought about how it would be here."

Schick Super Hoops

The 1993-94 Schick Super Hoops competition will see its first ever national champion emerge from a myriad of 13-on-3 intramural tournaments. Players from more than 800 schools will go "face-to-face" for a chance of a lifetime—playing for the national championship in an NBA arena.

After ten years of expansion, this latest development is the natural evolution of the tournament's format which was adjusted last year to winnow the 22 regional winners to four Divisional Champions. In the first year of Divisional competition, four male teams and four female teams emerged champions from round-robin tournaments at NBA arenas. Now the ultimate challenge has been issued as this year's divisional champions will vie for the national crown.

The divisional playoffs will still be held at NBA arenas which may be incentive enough for aspiring champions. But this year you have the opportunity to be the best intramural team in the country!

From 110 schools participating on the inaugural season to more than 800 schools in 1993. From a primarily Northeastern intramural tournament to a national basketball festival. From regional finals on college campuses to divisional tournaments and our first National Championship in an NBA arena. What ten years can do.

Ten years has also created stories and streaks, firsts and lasts, legendary performances and even underages!!! Schick Super Hoops has become the premier three-on-three college basketball tournament in the nation. A decade later.

News Briefs

WASHINGTON — Clinton lashed out at critics of his health care reform plan Tuesday. Clinton accused insurance groups who claim health care costs will skyrocket if his plan is approved of twisting the truth. Clinton also denied the plan would create a vast federal bureaucracy. The plan would guarantee health insurance to all Americans and require employers to pay 80 percent of premiums. The Congressional Budget Office said the plan would add $74 billion to the deficit over the next six years and premiums would increase by 15 percent.

WASHINGTON — Louis Farrakhan, leader of the Nation of Islam, finally responded to an aide's anti-semitic remarks last week. Farrakhan's aide, Khalid Abdul Muhammad, urged the killing of whites in South Africa, called Jews "bloodsuckers" and poked fun at Catholics and homosexuals in a speech last fall. Farrakhan said Muhammad's statements were "repugnant" but also said he had spoken unspecified "truths."

WASHINGTON — President Clinton finally agreed to lift the 19-year trade embargo against Vietnam last week. Clinton said the end of sanctions should help aid the search for MIAs and make it easier for American businesses to become involved in Vietnam's development. Vietnam estimates $40 billion will be needed to rebuild from the Vietnam War, with $27 billion coming from foreign investors.

WASHINGTON — The House voted in favor of a $9.72 billion emergency spending bill last week. The bill includes $7.78 billion to help California recover from last month's earthquake. The spending bill will be added to the '94 deficit rather than be offset by cuts.

JACKSON, Miss. — Byron De La Beckwith, the white supremacist who witnesses said had bragged about killing Medgar Evers, was convicted of murder Saturday. Evers, a black civil rights leader, was shot to death outside his home in 1964. Beckwith had avoided conviction in two previous trials, with all-white juries deadlocked. Beckwith, 73, was sentenced to life in prison.

LONDON — The "Fan Man" struck again on Saturday. The half-naked American paratrooper swooped down onto Buckingham Palace. James Miller was arrested soon after landing. He faced six charges of violating public order and air regulations. Miller sat down on the roof and stripped off his pants, revealing he was painted green from the waist down. Miller, 30, floated into an open-air arena in Las Vegas on Nov. 6, interrupting the Evander Holyfield-Riddick Bowe heavyweight title fight.

WILSON — The tobacco industry blasted a proposed 75-cent-per-pack increase Monday. Experts said the increase would cripple the American tobacco industry. The increase is part of President Clinton's $152 trillion budget. The tax is currently 24 cents per pack. The tax increase would help fund Clinton's health care program, bringing in $67 billion over the next six years. Gov. Jim Hunt said North Carolina would lose thousands of jobs if the tax is raised.

UNCW Female Student Assaulted In New Parking Lot

BY AMY BRENNAN
Executive Editor

Campus police are looking for a man who attempted to assault a UNCW woman on Wednesday, Feb. 2 at 3:05 a.m.

The woman, who is a senior, was in parking lot EE near the suites when a man approached her and shoved her into her car. As he attempted to accost her, another car pulled into the parking lot. The attacker fled on foot across the nearby wooden bridge toward the suites.

Although she did not see his face clearly, the victim described the man as a white male in his early to mid twenties. He was wearing jeans and a white T-shirt with colorful designs on the front and back. He is about six feet tall, thin build and has short, dark brown hair shaved into a wedge in back.

The woman reported that he used vulgarities and has an extremely southern accent.

Notices about the attack are being put up around campus. If you have any information, please contact Campus Police at 395-3184.

Officer Shawn Thomas of the Campus Police department said this is the first reported aggravated assault this year. She said incidents of this nature are rare at UNCW. Thomas offered some suggestions that may prevent attacks.

"Always be aware of your surroundings," Thomas said. "If you are uncomfortable being out at night you can call the police, and we'll give you an escort."

Thomas also said incidents of this type should be reported immediately to the police. In this case, the victim waited thirty minutes before notifying police.

There is a new self-defense program at UNCW called Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) which incorporates theory with basic martial arts techniques. RAD was developed by Larry Nadeau, a police training officer, and Sheri L. Lachetta, a residence hall director at the College of William and Mary. The twelve hour course teaches women to compensate for the difference between men and women in upper body strength. Women are typically taught that they are not strong enough to fight back against a man. RAD teaches the proper techniques so that they can fight back. The program includes two hours of lecture and ten hours of technique. At the end of the course, each woman must successfully defend herself against an attack, which is performed by an instructor.

The only cost for the program is a $12 manual. For more information or to register, contact the Campus Police.

Standards in Education Are Not High Enough

BY TREY CHEEK
Seahawk Reporter

Standards in education are not thorough enough to enter the business world.

Representatives from community colleges, universities, the state Education Commission and the UNC System's Board of Governors discussed education last month. The commission was encouraged to strive for "cradle to grave" education by N.C. Gov. Jim Hunt.

The director of the International Center for Leadership in Education, Willard Daggett, told the committee that business had made a bigger push for educational groups because business needs workers who can apply knowledge.

Daggett said educators should push beyond the planning stage of reform, "but if you move beyond that, beyond rhetoric, into action, it's going to be painful."

Daggett said theory is emphasized over application in current educational institutions. Public schools, colleges and universities do not have enough focus on their educational responsibilities, he said.

The U.S. ranks lower than other countries in math and science practical test scores because U.S. schools focus on theory too much and not enough on context, Daggett said.

Much of this is based on an article in Wilmington Star News.

Cape Fear Rising

BY JUNE ORAVITS
Seahawk Reporter

Almost 100 years after the Wilmington Riot, echoes of racial hatred can still be felt today. Philip Gerard's new novel Cape Fear Rising recounts the story of one of Wilmington's most horrendous hours.

Gerard, cites the 1898 Wilmington Riot as a "very extreme case of something that happens again and again." His novel is an attempt to transcend history and connect the riot to present day racial problems in America.

"I'm very concerned with what it is people are willing to stand up for. And this [riot] was a case where people had to decide which side they were on," Gerard said.

According to Mary Carroll in Booklist, Gerard "modestly calls Cape Fear Rising 'only a storyteller's history.' It is more: a well-researched, fascinating narrative that probably digests the roots of racism in the U.S., entertaining historical fiction that packs a telling contemporary punch."

Philip Gerard is director of the professional and creative writing program at UNC Wilmington. He is also the author of Hanrahan's Light and Brilliant Passage. His essays have been featured in broadcasts of National Public Radio's "All Things Considered."

Cape Fear Rising debuts this month. Philip Gerard will give a reading at a reception and book signing hosted by Bristol Books on Friday, Feb. 18, 7:00 p.m., 120 S. Front Street. This event is free and open to the public. Copies of Cape Fear Rising will be available. For more information call 251-3770.

Graduate in Four Years or Add Twenty-Five Percent?

BY JOEY NICHOLS
Seahawk Reporter

Beginning this fall, all students at state schools in North Carolina who fail to graduate in four years will pay an additional 25 percent tuition.

This legislation was approved in order to reduce the amount of money spent by the state on students who enjoy extended stays. According to section 89 of the 1993 legislative session, "Students who take more than 140 credit hours to complete a baccalaureate degree in a four-year program designated as a five-year program by the Board of Governors will be subject to the surcharge."

Along with the tuition increase, the legislation also requires that students be enrolled in 15 credit hours per semester to be considered full-time. Currently, the statewide average is 14.9. The UNCW average is about 14.6 hours.

The surcharge will take effect beginning at UNCW and other campuses in the 1994 school year and will be fully implemented by 1997.

An article in the Wilmington Morning Star stated that "in-state students fund only 11 percent of the actual college educational cost, while an out-of-state student funds about 80 percent." Because the school is state-funded, it can only accept a certain number of out-of-state students. Therefore, the rest of the funding falls directly on the state.

Students had different views on the matter. In-state student Stuart Minter St. James said, "I am planning to graduate in four years but I can see how a surcharge can be used in a beneficial way." However, out-of-state student Erin McDowell stated, "A surcharge on my tuition would add over $2,500 to my bill, whereas it would only add about $400 to an in-state student's bill. That is clearly ridiculous."

Not all people share the philosophy of the four-year degree, however. Chancellor Leutz, as well as the Board of Governors which oversees the UNC system, support a five-year degree program. It's an illusion to think that students are going to walk out after

Your Affair With VAX

BY JUNE ORAVITS
Seahawk Reporter

Warning! Is your computer having a steamy relationship with CyberSex? Don't be surprised when the affair is terminated right in the middle of the good stuff.

The VAX account you used to access CyberSex via Internet may be interrupted by a warning appearing on your computer monitor. Its purpose is to warn you that using the system for other than academic purposes will not be tolerated.

According to Doug Jackson, associate director of Academic Computing Services, the warning banner doesn't mean your VAX account has been closed. "We're preventing them from using it inappropriately. The user always has the option of logging back on to the system."

With only 11 nodes available and a resource maximum of 128 users, the VAX system is being stretched to the limit at UNC Wilmington, Jackson explained. The system has to support not only students services, but those of the administration and faculty as well. When students tax the system with other than academic tasks, it prevents access by other people.

"Our [computing services] budget and staff hasn't changed in the last five years," Jackson said. "We're a high growth industry, but we're going to have to start doing less with less."

Part of the growth process will be a move to SONET as the networking system within North Carolina, Jackson announced. He gave a tentative operational date of August. Out-of-state access will continue to be through the Internet system via SONET. "As an institution, UNCW has been mandated to connect with SONET by the state of North Carolina."

The issue of system overload is a real one, Jackson cautioned. "SONET won't change the problem, our problem is the VAX cluster. We're getting to a point where something needs to be done. We've asked for resources to upgrade."

Jackson said he encourages taking advantage of the computing services on campus, but warns that inappropriate use affects everyone. The warning sign appearing on your monitor is just one step to control and alleviate the problem.

Fly Wright Wins Again!

Fly Wright flew to the top of its division with its costume designs at the regional level of the Kennedy Center American College Theatre Festival.

This is the second year UNCW has entered the competition. The play won at the state level and then went to the regional level at Clemson University. The next step is the Kennedy Center.

Costume designer Georgia

Richardson graduated from UNCW in December. Her work on Fly Wright began as her senior project. She studied turn-of-the-century costume books, pictures and photographs for ideas.

Toni Bratton, assistant professor of design, said making it to the regional festival at Clemson is like going to the Super Bowl. "This will bring great recognition to the university and the drama program, and it will help Georgia's career as a designer," Bratton said. "This award is very much sought after."

Coming up with costumes for each of the characters was no small undertaking. There are 24 actors. Almost every one of those actors plays at least two characters. As Richardson put it, "There are millions of characters, but only 24 actors." Fortunately, many of the costumes could be rented from Thalian Hall and Farrell's Costumes, Ltd. See Fly Wright page 7

Languages and Cultures Center Board of Directors

UNIVERSITY NEWS BUREAU

Dr. James R. Leutze, Chancellor of UNC Wilmington, has been appointed by Governor Jim Hunt to serve as a member of the Board of Directors of the North Carolina Center for World Languages & Cultures.

The center, a public-private partnership, will be established near Misenheimer, N.C. on a site given to the state by Pfeiffer College. It will provide training in languages and cultures to business, educators, public service providers and federal government. In addition, it will provide cultural instruction for students and business people traveling abroad, and may also instruct foreign nationals coming to the United States in English language and American business customs.

Leutze believes the center is an answer to the growing demand for improved understanding of other languages and cultures. He commented, "given the fact that we are entering a more global society, foreign language proficiency for a larger group of American students as a logical first step in becoming a more competitive economy."

As a member of the board of directors, Leutze will be charged with setting the direction for the existing non-profit foundation that will be responsible for the center. The board will also assist in developing a comprehensive business plan for the center.

At the board's first meeting Feb. 2, the directors approved three pilot programs to determine existing resources for language training in the state and to set up pilot culture and language immersion training. They also appointed a search committee to find an executive director for the center.

This is a regional survey and all of the institutions except Richmond are public institutions. All responses are based upon either direct e-mail or phone conversations with the respondents. The numbers for the student labs are those managed by centralized Academic Support with little or no access restrictions. Nearly all of the institutions participating had departmental labs on campus, these numbers were not included in the numbers. It was suggested that a regional survey may not be particularly appropriate for North Carolina, as the staffing issue is particularly severe due to budget constraints. It may be more appropriate to survey computing in other states. At the College of Charleston, each academic department has its own microcomputer lab. If there are questions or comments, please contact Doug Jackson at UNC Wilmington at (910) 395-3805 JACKSOND@UNCWIL.EDU
